In olden days, when etiquette sanctioned little or no intercourse between the sexes, Valentines were dispatched in order to convey affectionate greetings. Now that loving couples see more of each other they are seldom used, except for abuse. When we speak of Valentines nowadays we generally refer, not to the elegant old-fashioned missives, but the hideous coloured monstrosities which adorn our toyshop windows. In these degenerate times a valentine is, more often than not, an insult from some anonymous individual, and he who would win the heart of some fair lady had far better send her a pictorial postcard.—Cherrypicker.

Rationalism and the Suffragette, destroying love, have destroyed also its graphic-poetic declaration—the Valentine. Or, if love be still rampant, the higher nature, stirred to its deeps, now requires more ethereal expression—say, chocolates. Again, St. Valentine was a respectable saint, and bishops (educated since Guy Thorne arose) have discontinued so obnoxious a use of the holy day. Then, pupil teachers have discovered that "Valentine" has no etymological connection with "galantin" (a lover). They therefore discountenance such an unwarrantable violation of philology. Hence the decline. Lastly, the Poet Laureate has refused to write any more Valentine verses. Hence the fall.—Little Ben.

Some folk say St. Valentine's Day has gone out of fashion; some say it has not; therefore, "quot homines tot sententiæ." But even granting the former to be right, the explanation is simple—"Autres temps, autres mœurs." Cupid is not such a "sentimental Tommy"-rotter as he used to be; his love is none the less ardent than before, but he conducts operations in a more business-like way. In these days of incandescent mantles and economic gas burners the flame of love burns none the less brightly for a smaller consumption of—"gas"!—Derula.

Valentine's Day died in "the up-to-date rush." Men and maidens are too matter of fact now. Our boys do not write verses to girls, or send pretty gifts, "From your Valentine," or girls watch to find out the name of the first man she sees on February 14, as "it" will be the name of her husband. No beating about the bush; the birds will come to the front without; romance expired when women's cigarettes came in.—Felsberg.

As there are patent medicines that cure every ill under the sun, so does the science of Evolution solve every riddle of the universe.

Man, the itinerant vagabond, marching through Time, drops his habits by the roadside as a tramp discards worn-out boots and holey garments.

The pride of to-day is the contempt of to-morrow.

The quaint usages of Valentine's Day have but followed the eternal order of things. They are a threadbare vestment cast into the limbo of the ages.

It is regrettable; it is inevitable; it is Evolution.—Cybele.

Here lies Valentine—once patron saint of lovers. Extinct as the dodo; snuffed out by an utilitarian age. Remembered only, by the vulgar, in rude images and ribald jests, displayed in tenth-rate shop windows; whereas, erewhile, thy dainty pledges wheedled coins from prince and statesmen!

Poor saint, thou has naught in common with the goggled motorist, the "muddled oaf," the Suffragette, or the slang-loving maiden of to-day! Unheeded would be thy love-laden sighs, unless accompanied by the "Golden Key," which alone openeth the hearts of England's men and maids in these modern days.—Hic Jacet.

Valentine's Day, with all its fooleries, vulgarities, vanities, and gushing sentiments of endearment, is almost annihilated, for revengeful or amorous dissipation. The lovely, fairy-like scraps, with touching lines, pleading for the maiden's heart, are scornfully disowned. The hideous splashes of pictorial art no longer invite the malignant humour of jealous rivals or broken friendships. The new age is polished and refined. Gentility, courtesy, and good breeding are cultivated. The mind has higher aims. Love is in the market, with dignity or dollars. Calumny wears a smile. Hostility gracefully unbends. The magic art of inward illumination determines the saintly change.—Mary.

The blight and mildew of old age have demolished the energy and marred the glory of the patron saint of wit, humour, and amorous dedications. His day is in shadow. And why? Pictorial art has risen to the sublime. The songs of love are chanted in halls of music. Flowery maids and matrons expand their charms where the gods give praise. Emulation in artistic shows and refinement of sentiment bestows superiority. Cupid's appeals are ignored. The broken heart is soon patched. Dollars supply the requisite enchantment. Blushing modesty is scornfully reviled. Matrimonial aspirants present their credentials in public form.—Diana.

The decline of St. Valentine's Day is an effect of the emancipation of women. Just think what girls were in the days when an ardent swain used to manœuvre to be the first seen by his lady-love on St. Valentine's Day, and what they are now, when they go off to business by train, and compete with men in the open market! There is the bread-and-butter miss at one end of the chain and the bread-and-butter earner at the other; and men have to get up early to hold their own instead of getting up early to be a Valentine.—Almaviva.

Saint Valentine must go. The modern spirit—if anything so material may be called a spirit—derides him. We have no use for him—that is the phrase! We picture him wearing peg-tops and Piccadilly weepers, and they are unfashionable. Cupid himself is no longer the marksman, but the mark, and our shafts we tip with levity. Love's tokens now must have intrinsic value to make up for the poorer quality of the love. We have exchanged poetry for slang, and lavender for patchouli. We go in for the vivisection of self, and would analyse the bloom off a peach.—Nibbler.

Valentines, of latter days, were mainly of three types—the sentimental, the silly, and the scurrilous, or sometimes a combination of two of the three. Sentiment ceased to be in vogue. The silly type was merely ridiculous, but ridicule kills. The scurrilous was disgusting. The custom thus brought about its own decline by the inept methods employed in its observance, and the final blow was given by the coming of the Christmas card. This last statement is proved by the Post Office returns, the increase in the Christmas postings being coincident with a rapid decrease in those of Valentine's Day.—Petros.

Saints and the Valentine sentiment are equally at a discount. The winter festival has eclipsed the festival of spring. To Christmas and New Year's cards has been added the picture postcard, which, beggar-like, is always with us. Art is so lavished on these other missives that the "ugly" valentines alone survive—for death! Lads and lassies no longer draw names from St. Valentine's box, for can they not anywhere invoke the gipsy-queen by putting a penny in the slot? Telephones, telegraphs, tubes, trams, and buzzers are at hand, and nothing approaches the personal interview for matrimonial business purposes.—Ox Short.

I may be an old bachelor, but I can resolve ye this problem in less than a hundred words. In my day, boys of all classes spent the scanty remnants of their Christmas cash on Valentines, some tender tribute to the selected sweetheart.

The dimpled darlings, whether in servants' hall or boarding school, furbished up their last year's leavings of lace, heart-pourings, and filigree, altered perchance the pencilled price, and posted them stampless to promiscuous but possible admirers. If these sacrifices to the little love-god have ceased nowadays, it is owing to the confounded cupidity of the rising generation.—Thersites.

"The world is grown old," says the philosopher. "We dress sombrely, we play sombrely, we drink sombrely, and now we love sombrely." "Just fancy sending a Valentine to a modern girl," sneers the cynic. "She would use it to light her cigarette with, or write golf scores on the back." "Things were different when I was young," growls the old stager. "Then men were men, and love was love. When I courted your mother, sir, . . ." The whine of the moneygrubber rises, "What is love? A shadow! Wealth is happiness." But youth smiles contentedly, for many are the ways of love.—Oiseau.

Poets and all amiable persons regret the decline of Valentines. At this genial season, when birds marry, the bashful youth writes Angelina the condition of his heart. Valentines flourished when written. When they became articles of commerce they grew common. Sensible women prefer original composition to printed verses. Men are not all poets, or even versifiers. But persons of taste might send good selections complimentary to women, like this:—

"The world was sad! The garden was a wild!
And man, the hermit, sigh'd—till woman smil'd."

Scottish people call a poet a maker, thus retaining the original Greek sublime word.—J. McGrigor Allan.

The romantic customs and associations connected with St. Valentine's Day are out of harmony with this money-making age. Open, unabashed chivalry is almost non-existent. A lover of to-day rarely wears his heart on his sleeve, or, if he does, he has not placed it there intentionally. The main cause of the decline, however, is the growth of the vulgar valentine. The hideous comic Valentine has gradually displaced the silk and satin messages of a few years ago, and by investing the custom with ridicule has contributed more than anything else to the desuetude into which the festival has fallen.—Hyde.

Mild flirtations were formerly the order of the day, and numbers of youthful victims were then taken in and done for, with frequently improvident results. At the present day few can afford to trifle with a pastime that might lead to irretrievable positions. Men are now habitually cautious with regard to matrimony, and play a waiting game. They look well round, and study the situation from all points, especially the pecuniary one. Women, too, do not marry as a rule till nearing thirty, and therefore the frivolity of Valentine's Day has ceased to be a means to an end. Canning.

The fine art publishers themselves may be responsible.

The decline set in when even the man in the street was hooked at Christmas by the bait of De La Rue. There was, here, a sort of passive imperativeness to purchase. The cynics set to work with a cold douche, but their efforts were misguided, for the douche led to a deluge on the other side—through the simultaneous rise of the New Year card. Here is active imperativeness, on the principle that: "If I do not send the one, I must send the other." Hence the Fall after the Deluge! Caledon.

Why is Valentine's Day neglected? As well ask why we don't travel by sailing ships: because we no longer need it, having far easier means of corresponding, as superior to poor old Saint Valentine as steamers are to sailing ships for speed—and equally prosaic by comparison. Man's ingratitude being proverbial, the patron Saint of lovers is being yearly more neglected, now that the thorny path of courtship has been worn smooth by time and custom, and for a maid to write to a man ceased to be one of the seven deadly sins. Postal revenues increase correspondingly. Hatter.

The heartrending wail of the Saint is surely that oft-repeated cry: "I have lived my life."

The designing of Valentines is no longer considered a fine art, and thereby hangs the tale. The few displayed in the publisher's window have but little original design or artistic talent displayed in their creation—certainly none sufficient to kindle sentiment in the matter-of-fact public, who with interest unawakened pass by.

Forgetfulness is principally the root of this evil, for sentiment but slumbers, and in reality "The old order (only) changeth, yielding place to new"-er designs. S. Era Exshaw.

Poor St. Valentine! Poor bedraggled, wing-broken, sat-upon Cupid! No more rustic swain in search of ye, no maiden of high degree listening for the postman's knock! Alack, alack! Hacked, kicked, Rugby fashion, into nothingness, ye are dead as a door-nail! And what enemy hath done this? Verily, the noble army of Christmas cards, coming, locust-like, ten thousand strong, to stay, has ousted your old favourites from your stronghold here, and clean put your little pipe out. But in the Eternal City damsels cast their billets doux at the feet of a Saint annually, and so the tradition survives. Aster.

As the years pass one by one, many an old custom fades with them into oblivion, so as to let some new craze have its day, which may live and flourish, or else have a similar fate to its predecessor.

Christmas cards, which are sent now in such numbers, have undoubtedly been the Valentine's successful rivals. True, some twenty years ago both were in vogue, but the Christmas card of that period was ugliness itself, while that of the present day—even for a halfpenny—is "a thing of beauty and a joy." Consequently, as December's custom grew, February's decayed. Ethna.

The decline and fall of St. Valentine's Day was brought about by cheap printing and illustrating; Valentines then lost their chaste appearance, and became vulgar and low. Game B.

St. Valentine has accomplished his work satisfactorily. It must be admitted that his services were possibly required in the bygone ages; but now it is very different.

In our young days one of his chief ultimate objects was to encourage proposals of marriage and the consummation thereof; but now we are all married, or nearly so; and those of us who are not are too poor to venture the risks involved (there's the new servant risk also).

Why not let the custom die a natural death, and let well alone? Something fresh might be substituted. Rho.

Saint Valentine, you are deposed! Illustrious in past ages, your glory has now departed!

Jester, lover, avenger, and scandaliser, your days are numbered and your grave is ready! And why? The light of mental expansion is spreading. The cultivation of the classic forms of pictorial art has decreed your doom. The machine gives variety and colour cheap. Maidens and widows, bachelors and philosophers refuse to surrender to the terrors and convivialities once inspired by your miscellaneous effusions. The bleeding heart with Cupid's arrow through it has vanished.

The carnival of foolery is decked with funeral wreaths. No emblems of sorrow. Crank.

St. Valentine is dead! He was slain by his rival, Santa Claus—the latter saint having artfully pandered to the taste of children, who occupy a very different place in the world from what they did some fifty years ago.

And women, alas! have no time for sentiment nowadays.

Even should a modern man condescend to purchase and send some touching emblem, such as a flaming heart, garlanded by forget-me-nots, bearing words of rapturous love, would it not be greeted with shouts of laughter by the athletic maiden, and cause the suffragette to shiek anew? Autre temps, autres mœurs. Belinda.

Saint Valentine has had his day. This is an age when delicacy emanates not from the refinement of our feeling, but from the restaurateur, and appeals to our taste only in a gastronomic sense. King Candour reigns supreme; anonymity, no longer the verdure concealing the modest violet, is but the shadowy niche where lurks in safety the assassin armed with the stiletto of invective. Love may laugh at locksmiths, but displays a respect for their handiwork, the strong-room, nor fails, in defiance of Saint Valentine, to leave his card or his offering at the shrine of beauty. Eldibee.

February 14 marks in the calendar the period of Nature's awakening from winter's sleep, and long associated in popular fancy with the budding of tender sentiments in men and maidens. Modern ideals, however, have developed in the youth of both sexes an early condition of wideawakeness which renders special periods for the purpose unnecessary. The age of the new woman has come, and with it aspirations more practical and less romantic. Moonlight rambles, the evergreen pictorial postcard, a better understanding of the law of affinity, make the flimsy, scented, anonymous Valentine ridiculous. Hence the decline of the old Saint's popularity. Gilt Sticks.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1575. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, March 6, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, *which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. ENTRE NOUS.

MY Puzzle Editor has not yet received applications for their prizes from "La Mancha" and "New York," the first and second prize winners in the recent "Kenwig-street Murder" Queer Story Competition. I shall be glad if the writers of the solutions sent in under the above-mentioned noms de plume will now apply, giving their own names and addresses, for the prizes which they have been awarded.

The Court will not be much in residence at Windsor Castle during the summer. The King and Queen are expected there for ten days during the Whitsuntide holidays, and they will also reside at the Castle from June 15 to 24, for Ascot races. It is very likely that a large garden party will be given at Windsor Castle this year, in which case it will take place about the end of May or early in June, when the King and Queen of Denmark will be on a visit to the Court.

The King is staying at Biarritz at the Hôtel du Palais, in the same suite of apartments which he occupied last year. These rooms, fourteen in number, comprise the ground floor of the southern wing of the house, and there are beautiful views from the large windows. The King has a drawing-room, a dining-room, and a library, all en suite. The rooms contain a great deal of the furniture which belonged to Napoleon III. and the Empress Eugénie. On fine mornings the King breakfasts under an awning on the terrace outside his rooms, after which he devotes a couple of hours at least to business with Sir Arthur Davidson, the acting private secretary. The déjeuner is usually served at half-past twelve.

At the second Court there was a very much larger attendance of general company, with a thin entrée and a comparatively small diplomatic circle. An important change has been made in the regulations, in that only those who have the entrée are now allowed to go directly into the ball-room. Others wait until the time arrives for them to pass the presence of the King and Queen, after which they leave the room at once. Their Majesties were late in arriving, as they had given three private audiences in the Blue Drawing-room before the procession to the ball-room was formed. Lady Crewe presented the Ambassadresses and the wives of the other Chefs de Mission, and the duties of Lord Steward were undertaken by Lord Farquhar, in consequence of the illness of Lord Liverpool. The Court could not be described as a notably "smart" ceremonial, for, apart from the personages in waiting, the attendance of the élite of society was exceedingly limited, while there was a great show of the class described by the late Lord Sydney as "tagrag and bobtail." The floral decorations were much admired.

The Court was over before twelve, and the King and Queen and the members of the Royal family (of whom very few were present) left in procession (as on arrival) for the supper-room, followed by the Corps Diplomatique. Supper for the guests was served at buffets, and there was the usual magnificent display of the Crown plate, and a fine show of fruit. The supper was very good, as it now always is at the Palace.

The next Court will be held early in May, probably on Friday, the 3rd, and there will be a fourth one later on in the season, probably immediately after the Whitsuntide holidays.

It is now probable that the Queen will leave Sandringham about Monday, the 18th, and that a day or two later her Majesty will embark at Portsmouth on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert for Gibraltar, where she will spend a few days with the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife. On the passage to Gibraltar the Victoria and Albert will probably stop at Cadiz for a day in order that the Queen may pay a visit to the Comtesse de Paris at the Château of Villamanrique. Her Majesty will go from Gibraltar to Marseilles, where she is to be joined by the King (coming direct from Biarritz) on April 1 or 2. The Royal yacht will then proceed on a three weeks' cruise, which will terminate at Genoa or Venice, and the King will then return overland to London.

A weekly journal announces that the King intends to enlarge the house at Sandringham very considerably, and that the plans for the contemplated additions to the Hall have already been drawn out. It is possible that three or four rooms may be added to the present house, in order to afford further accommodation for members of suites. But there is no idea of enlarging the house "on account of its insufficient accommodation for entertaining parties." The present house has afforded ample accommodation for the last thirty-five years for larger parties than are now usually entertained there. Of late there has been a tendency at Sandringham to cut down the number of guests rather than to increase it.

The present house at Sandringham was completely rebuilt from designs by Humbert a few years after the King (then Prince of Wales) had purchased the estate from the late Mr. Spencer Cowper, but a ballroom and other additions were afterwards made to the mansion, which is more remarkable for comfort and a well-arranged interior than for any distinguished architectural merit. It is understood that Sandringham has been settled by the King upon the Queen as a dower-house.

It was stated in Truth several weeks ago that the first series of the correspondence of Queen Victoria will be published by Mr. Murray in October. A paragraph appeared in numerous journals last week which described this work as an "official life" of her late Majesty. The book is in no sense a biography, as it will consist simply and solely of the letters written by Queen Victoria. The statement that the King "has written personally a large portion of it" is a ridiculous invention. His Majesty has merely looked through the proof sheets of the three volumes in order that he might signify his approval of the publication of the letters which had been selected by Lord Esher and Mr. Benson. An enormous collection of Queen Victoria's political correspondence, and of her other papers relating to public affairs, has been carefully preserved in the so-called "secret" library at Buckingham Palace, and all Prince Albert's letters and memoranda have also been kept. These were arranged after his death by the late General Grey.

I gave an account last week of the arrangements which had been made for the public visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Glasgow next month. An important change of programme has since been decided upon. The Prince and Princess are to arrive at Blythswood House on Monday, April 22, and they were to have returned south on Thursday, the 25th. It has now been arranged for them to stay at Blythswood until the morning of Friday, the 26th, and on Thursday, the 25th, they will formally open the new dock at Clydebank. The Prince and Princess (then Duke and Duchess of York) performed a similar ceremony on the Clyde about ten years ago, when they opened the great Prince's Dock. The ceremony of April 25 will take place in the morning, and it is very likely that in the afternoon the Prince and Princess will pay a visit to Sir Hugh and Lady Alice Shaw-Stewart at Ardgowan, their splendid and beautiful domain on the Clyde, near Greenock, which is one of the finest country seats in the west of Scotland.

It was announced in Truth several months ago that the Princes Edward and Albert of Wales would be sent to the Royal Naval School at Osborne, and afterwards to the Naval College at Dartmouth. Prince Edward goes to Osborne after the Easter holidays, and he will be followed in a few months by Prince Albert. It was stated last week in some of the papers that "it is not yet certain whether Prince Edward will adopt a naval or a military career." As a matter of fact, it has been for some time "settled" by the King (in conjunction with the Prince and Princess of Wales) that Prince Edward is to go through a course of education for the Navy, and he will afterwards proceed (with his brother) on one or two voyages. Prince Edward will then enter the Army, while Prince Albert is to remain in the Navy. This arrangement is in accordance with the family precedents. The King is the supreme authority on all questions concerning the education or custody of members of the Royal family, and in these matters the Sovereign has absolute power.

Princess Christian will leave England shortly for the Riviera, on a visit to the Grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at the Château de Fabron. Prince Christian will stay, during the absence of the Princess, at Cumberland Lodge.

It was announced in Truth several months ago that the Empress Dowager of Russia was expected to come to England on a visit to the Queen. Circumstances have caused this visit to be postponed, but the Empress is now on her journey from St. Petersburg to London, and she will arrive at Buckingham Palace to-morrow, and will be the guest of her sister at Sandringham for about ten days. It is probable that the Empress Marie will leave England with the Queen on board the Royal yacht, from which she will land at Marseilles, whence she is expected to proceed to Cannes, where several members of the Russian Imperial family are now staying. The Empress Marie paid her last visit to England, with her husband, during the summer of 1873.

It was stated in Truth last week that his Majesty intends to confer the Order of the Garter upon the King of Saxony, and that the Prince of Wales would probably go to Dresden on a special mission to invest his Majesty with the ribbon and insignia. It is probable that this arrangement will be changed, and that the King himself will invest the King of Saxony at Biarritz. The King of Saxony left Hamburg on Saturday for Lisbon, on a short visit to his cousin, the King of Portugal, and he intends to return home overland, making brief halts at Madrid, Biarritz, and Paris.

The Grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha and her youngest daughter, Princess Beatrice, who have spent the winter at Coburg, are to arrive this week at Nice for a stay of two months at the Château de Fabron. The Grand Duchess Marie and Princess Beatrice are expected to visit England in June, and they will probably spend about a fortnight in London as the guests of the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace. The relations of the Grand Duchess Marie with the Tsar and Tsaritsa have been considerably strained since her second daughter, the ex-Grand Duchess of Hesse, married the Grand Duke Cyril Vladimirovitch, after their union had been positively forbidden by the Tsar.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen returned on Monday to Dublin Castle from their short visit to England. Amongst the visitors who stayed at the Castle during the week were Lord and Lady Wicklow, Ladies Alexandra Hamilton, Mabel and Violet Anson, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Smith, and Mr. G. and Miss M. Coates. A succession of entertainments was given during the week, at which Lady Aberdeen, owing to indisposition, was unable to be present. On Friday evening Lord Aberdeen, with a Viceregal party and staff, attended the annual concert of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, and afterwards distributed the prizes to the successful pupils. He made a graceful speech on the occasion. This week the Lace Ball at the Castle is the leading social event in Dublin.

The death of Lady Ripon is stated by a so-called "society writer" to have been "entirely unexpected," to which it is added that "few people knew that she was even ill." As a matter of fact, Lady Ripon had been a complete invalid for nearly three years, during which period she has resided entirely at Lord Ripon's house at Chelsea, as she was unable to travel to Studley Royal, the family place in Yorkshire. Lady Ripon's illness took a turn for the worse three weeks ago, and for several days before her death not the slightest hope of her recovery was entertained.

Lady Ripon was a daughter of Mr. Henry and Lady Mary Vyner, of Gautby Hall, Lincolnshire, and granddaughter of the first Earl de Grey. Her mother was co-heiress of Lord de Grey's large estates, in conjunction with her sister, the late Lady Cowper, and she inherited the fine domain of Newby Hall, in Yorkshire, which now belongs to Lady Ripon's brother, Mr. Robert Vyner. Lady Vyner herself was a very clever and highly accomplished woman, and a charming hostess. She was exceedingly kind and charitable, and took a deep and warm interest in all those among whom she lived. She succeeded her mother, Lady Mary Vyner, in the carrying on of many good works in and around Ripon, and she was always ready to help the charitable and philanthropic institutions of the district. The King and Queen (when Prince and Princess of Wales) were more than once guests at Studley Royal, and the Prince of Wales has stayed there several times for grouse-shooting. Until Lady Ripon's health failed Studley Royal was the scene of constant hospitality during the autumn and winter. She had excellent taste, and greatly improved the famous Dutch gardens at Studley Royal and the demesne generally by alterations which she suggested, and which were carried out under her supervision.

In political affairs Lady Ripon took a keen and most intelligent interest, and the Sunday afternoon receptions which she held for many years at Lord Ripon's former house in Carlton-gardens were regularly attended by many of the leading statesmen of the day. She was of immense assistance to her husband while he was Viceroy of India, and as loyal and devoted a helpmate as Lady Canning. The greatest sympathy is felt for Lord Ripon in the irreparable loss he has sustained. When he and Lady Ripon celebrated their golden wedding in 1901 he said: "We have lived and worked together for fifty long and happy years, and I have learnt to love and trust her more as each of these years has gone by."

Mr. J. W. Barclay, who died last week, was for twenty years Member for Forfarshire, from 1872 until 1886 as a Liberal, and then until 1892 as a Unionist. He was always prominent in connection with agricultural affairs, which he thoroughly understood. Mr. Barclay was an early and an enthusiastic supporter of scientific methods of farming. He farmed himself on the improved principles at Glenbucket, his place in Aberdeenshire, and field experiments were regularly conducted there in connection with the Aberdeen Agricultural College. He was very popular, and during his Parliamentary career he was generally regarded in Scotland as being peculiarly the representative of the farmers.

for less than two years. He was a son of the ninth Earl of Fingall, and became a paid attaché in 1885. After serving in many subordinate posts he was appointed Minister at Tokyo in 1883, and afterwards became Minister at Stockholm and Brussels successively, the last five years of his official career being passed at Vienna, where he succeeded Sir Horace Rumbold as Ambassador in 1900. Sir Francis was a very able man, and a dexterous diplomatist. He was full of tact and urbanity, but, at the same time, he was both acute and resolute. He was everywhere very popular, both officially and in society, and his death will be regretted by friends in many parts of the world. Sir Francis settled in Paris on his retirement from public life.

Sir Francis Tress Barry, who died on Thursday, was the Tory Member for Windsor from 1890 until the last General Election, when he retired. In early life he was a merchant at Bilbao, when he was also a member of the Consular Service. Sir Francis Barry made a large fortune out of the San Domingo copper mines in Portugal, and his brother-in-law, the late Mr. James Mason (afterwards of Ensham Hall, Oxfordshire), was his partner in the exploitation of that lucrative undertaking. About thirty years ago he purchased the beautiful domain of St. Leonard's Hill, in Windsor Forest. He was a great benefactor to Windsor in many ways, and his charities of all kinds were most munificent.

Sir Robert Rollo, Colonel of the Black Watch, who died at Bournemouth last week in his ninety-third year, was a younger son of the eighth Baron Rollo, and great-uncle of the present peer. He joined the 42nd Highlanders in 1832, and in 1846 he was sent on a special mission to Tripoli, and received the thanks of the Government for his services. During the greater part of the Crimean War Sir Robert commanded the 42nd, and he greatly distinguished himself on several occasions. He afterwards served on the Staff in Canada for five years, and then he was military secretary to Sir Fenwick Williams for another term of five years. He returned to England in 1865. He was for some years Colonel of the 93rd Highlanders until he was appointed to his old regiment.

The offer mentioned in last week's Truth to furnish a noble lord with his pedigree back to Adam and Eve for 35s. has interested many of my readers who have genealogical or archæological tastes, and they have been good enough to give me much valuable information on the subject. I select the following as the one which possibly explains how Mr. McGregor, of Edinburgh, is able to price his goods so cheaply:—

> Whether the heathen Cerdic was fully informed about his ancestry it is perhaps impossible to say now. But in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, year 860, the monkish chronicler gives the pedigree of King Æthelwulf (Alfred's father), tracing it back (probably correctly) to Cerdic, and then back to one Scaef, who is said to have been born in Noah's Ark! From Noah to Adam, of course, the pedigree comes from the chronicler's knowledge of Genesis.

This is the first I have heard of an addition to Noah's family having occurred during the sojourn in the Ark, but it is just the sort of inconvenient time at which such events do happen.

Another reader, who seems afraid—quite unnecessarily—that I may be sending 35s. to Edinburgh for the pedigree of Cerdic, warns me that very possibly the connection of the noble family in question with the Hebrew patriarchs may be due to some previous holder of the title having, for reasons of financial convenience, espoused a Jewish maiden—I suppose he means a moneylender's daughter or something of that kind. But I should not like to give pain to the very excellent peer who sent me McGregor's letter by countenancing such a suggestion.

THE MORALS OF MARRIED MEN.

(By a Perplexed Maiden.)

The Bishop of London lays his ban
Unsparing, upon the married man,
Whose morals his lordship declares e'en more
Lax than are those of the bachelor.

It used to be thought that wedlock's yoke
Steadied and tamed the fastest bloke.
But now it appears in another light,
With results precisely the opposite.

Now, if the Bishop's remarks are true,
What is a girl like myself to do?
'Tis a choice of evils—an old maid's life,
Or else to become some Lothario's wife.

An old maid's life, with its parrot and cat!
Perish the notion! I can't stand that!
So, e'en though husbands frivol and frisk,
I think, after all, I will take the risk.

One of my readers asks me whether it is legal for an omnibus company to fine its drivers and conductors for short earnings. I should be inclined to say that it is not, were it not that in these days it is not easy for an employer of labour to stretch his rights beyond the limits that the law allows; and it may be presumed that omnibus drivers would long since have made a firm stand against this practice if the law were on their side. But the system is very harsh and oppressive, as has often been pointed out in these columns; and it has become much harder on the men at the present time, when they are in charge of horse omnibuses which have to compete with motor vehicles. My correspondent has had his wrath aroused by a 'bus driver of his acquaintance who had recently been fined three days' pay for short earnings under these conditions. It is not easy to see that a 'bus driver can do much towards either filling or emptying his vehicle. He ought to have to do his journey in a given time, and to be paid for doing it, whether the public patronise the vehicle or not. But if the companies desire to interest their servants in pushing the business, the proper way to do so is to give them a percentage on the receipts, not to dock their pay when trade is unsatisfactory.

I do not profess to know whether carriage-horses really object to bearing-reins. I should fancy that it must be disagreeable to them when moving forward quickly with a heavy load behind them, although it may not be so disagreeable as to amount to absolute torture, whether or not they suffer from it when standing still. There was a meeting not long since of the Anti-Bearing-Rein Association, when the chair was taken by Lady Orford. A letter was read, in reply to a request of the association to place a notice in the quadrangle of Burlington House, requesting coachmen to slacken their bearing-reins when carriages stand there, and considerable indignation was elicted by a reply to the effect that the President and Council decline to do so. If my view be correct, however, this would be of little service to the horses, for the bearing-rein would have to be fixed precisely at the moment when it would be most distressful to them.

Lady Orford, said the reporter, made the following observations to him: "Undoubtedly, with a bearing-rein, you have a greater control over the horse, and in these exceptional cases (Court carriages), where great lives and interests are involved, it may, as a question of safety, be permitted." I cannot help thinking that all persons, whether great interests in their lives be involved or not, are likely to consider that they are of so much importance to themselves that they will not consent to incur risks which the association considers are excessive in the case of great personages. Moreover, with all respect to Royalties and courtiers, there are many others whose lives are as valuable as theirs. Would, then, Lady Orford suggest that ministers, judges, admirals, generals, bishops, doctors, men of science, etc., should be allowed to fix bearing-reins on their carriage-horses as an additional security against accidents, no matter what torture the reins might be to the horses?

Apropos of the story told by a correspondent the other day of the blackmailing of nurserymen by gardeners, one of my readers relates the following experience. He has been accustomed to order his vegetable seeds of a first-class firm from a list supplied by his gardener. Finding that this list was growing even more vigorously than the seeds—he had five shillingsworth of onion seed last spring—he this year ordered a box of seeds of another firm at a guinea and a half, in place of his gardener's list, which came to nearly £4. When he produced his box of seeds, the gardener "gave a month's notice on the spot." As the man was receiving 24s. a week, besides a house, fuel, light, and milk, his prospect of perquisites from the other seedsman must have been pretty substantial to make it worth his while to take this step. Possibly he was contending for an important professional principle, like the doctors and lawyers with their trade-union rules. It may be that he felt he would lose caste by serving an employer who could do such an ungentlemanly thing as to buy a collection of seeds in a box, instead of using the prescription supplied by his regular horticultural adviser.

Another of my readers sends the following letter, as an example of the "secret commissions" system and the effects of the new Act. The letter comes from a large game-dealer with whom my correspondent had dealt for many years—in blissful ignorance, apparently, of what his head keeper was getting out of the business:—

> Dear Sir,—The shooting season being closed, I venture to take the liberty of asking your permission to send the Head Game-the same time to comply with the new Act just passed.
> The motive is simply to recognise the season just closed, at the same time to comply with the new Act just passed
> Thanking you in anticipation of your esteemed reply, etc.

In these days of cut-throat competition between newspapers we can none of us afford to lavish compliments too freely upon our contemporaries. Personally, I feel this so strongly that I always abuse them for choice. But I am bound to congratulate Mr. Massingham, and all else concerned, upon the first number of the Nation, which has now replaced the Speaker, under Mr. Massingham's editorship. I never could quite understand why the Speaker was not more successful, and this is not a proper occasion for an inquiry into the question. But it may be seen at a glance that the Nation is an improvement upon its predecessor in more respects than one; and all who know its editor will expect to see the improvement more pronounced as time goes on. I hope, therefore, that the Nation has a brilliant career before it, and that we shall all of us find the supply of sixpences equal to the demands we are making upon an appreciative public.

While I trust that as a mere man I am as charitable as my neighbours, as an editor I am compelled to place business first and charity second. In this respect I am not aware that I differ from other editors or other people who have to conduct commercial undertakings. Now, a gentleman has sent to my musical critic an advertisement of an eminent singer, cut from the Morning Post, with an intimation that it would be "very charitable" on his part to allude to the announcement in his weekly article. People not infrequently do this sort of thing, which is my reason for putting on record the foregoing observations. Possibly, if the singer's advertisement had been published in Truth and then sent to the Morning Post, the Morning Post would have been charitable enough to repeat it free of charge. The gentleman who appeals to me can easily try this experiment, and I shall be delighted to co-operate in it. But I am sorry to say that at present he has begun at the wrong end.

The indefatigable Manning Press was mentioned in last week's Truth as engaged in exploiting "Derbyshire Leaders: Social and Political," under the name of "Ernest Gaskell, Author." It is quite impossible to keep pace with the literary activities of this hustler. From another of his circulars, it appears that he is also at work on "Cheshire Leaders: Social and Political." Only a few months ago he had marked down Lancashire Leaders for his prey. The Cheshire Leaders, of course, pay three guineas, like the others, for the honour offered them, and the same description of the volume, and the same formulas, are used in cadging for subscriptions, and following up the "Leaders" who hang back when first summoned to enrol themselves. But it is rather odd that while Manning Press is "Ernest Gaskell" to Derbyshire men, he becomes "W. Gaskell" to the men of Cheshire. Whether he forgets his own aliases, or whether he seriously supposes that he can conceal his identity by changing his initials, he alone knows.

One of the easiest ways of earning a living that I know of is to call on ladies in answer to advertisements for servants and obtain a few shillings for payment of railway fare. It is a very ancient trick, and I should have thought that by this time all ladies were forewarned and forearmed against it; but I had a letter the other day from a gentleman describing how a lady relative of his had parted with two half-crowns under such circumstances on two days in succession to prepossessing females who professed to have travelled long distances to apply for her place, and gave promising references to their present employers. The victim must be a beginner at housekeeping, and the five shillingsworth of experience which she has thus obtained may be far from useless to her.

THE MAID BEHIND THE BAR.

(By a Cynical Bachelor.)

Some Puritanic folk, I hear,
With horror painting are
The perils of the maid's career
Who serves behind a bar.

They conjure up some youthful miss,
Fair as a radiant star,
Whom every chappie longs to kiss—
The maid behind the bar.

I've seen her often, day and night,
I've seen her near and far;
She never struck me in that light—
The maid behind the bar.

A damsel of uncertain years,
Whose looks are on a par—
That's mostly how to me appears
The maid behind the bar.

Who with this elderly coquette
Would play young Lochinvar?
Oh, no! She's pretty safe, you bet—
The maid behind the bar.

The announcement last week of Lord Curzon's adoption at a preliminary meeting held at Oxford to select a candidate for the Chancellorship of the University was entirely inaccurate and misleading. What took place at the meeting, which was held at Magdalen, was that several names were mentioned, and that for Lord Curzon's name about thirty-seven hands were held up, there being 130 members of Convocation present. In regard to certain of the names reasons were given why they could not or would not stand, but on what authority does not appear. No candidate, therefore, was voted for by a majority of those present, or anything approaching it, and most members left under the impression that no candidate had been formally adopted. The election of a Chancellor by Convocation takes place on March 14, and nominations may be put in up to the end of this week; and as there is a widespread feeling in Oxford, not by any means confined to one political party, that an attempt has been made to rush Lord Curzon's candidature through, it is by no means impossible that a contest may yet take place.

The preparations are now far advanced for the "Historical Pageant" which is to take place at Oxford in next Commemoration Week. The Pageant will really be a "folk-play" on a grand scale, in an open-air theatre on the banks of the Cherwell, looking over Christ Church meadow to the Long Walk. A number of eminent writers, among them Mr. Lawrence Binyon and Mr. Stanley Weyman, are contributing to the "libretto," Sir Hubert Parry will be responsible for the music, while the best intellect of Oxford, archæological, historical, artistic, and dramatic, will be employed in the dressing, mounting, and stage-management of the piece. The "scenario," of which I have been privileged to inspect a rough proof, will comprise about sixteen tableaux, illustrating the history of Oxford from the time of St. Frideswide to that of the Prince Regent—a wide gap to fill up. Altogether, the show promises to be of exceptional interest, and in every way worthy of the place.

The election of the Rev. R. W. Inge to the Lady Margaret Chair of Divinity at Cambridge, in the place of the Dean of Ely, has given much satisfaction among University Liberals. He has resided both at Oxford and at Cambridge, and combines in himself much of the best thought of both Universities. Mr. Inge was described before the election as the special representative of philosophy among the four candidates. He is a profound scholar and altogether a wide-minded man.

The Bishop of Oxford has presented the Rev. G. B. Crawford, vicar of Bicester, to the living of Sonning, vacant by the preferment of Canon Holmes. Sonning is a most picturesque village on the banks of the Thames, with a fine church, and a delightful old vicarage. This living was held for over forty years by the Rev. Hugh Pearson, Canon of Windsor, who refused the deanery of Westminster after the death of his intimate friend, Dean Stanley.

It was stated in Truth last week that the King has approved of an Order in Council by which a third residentiary canonry in Truro Cathedral has been founded, the stipend being £300 a year. Bishop Stubbs has appointed Sub-Dean Hassard, Rector of Truro, to this stall. The living of Truro is of very small value, and no stipend is annexed to the office of Sub-Dean of the Cathedral.

The Bishop of Durham preached on a recent Sunday in St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, and Dr. Moule is praised by a writer whose knowledge on the subject is obviously blundering and defective for having set a good example to other dignitaries by appearing in a Charing Cross Hospital, W.C., Convalescent Home. Limpsfield, dependent on £15,000 a year from voluntary sources. Contributions urgently solicited.

Presbyterian pulpit, as if this was the first instance of such "reunion." Dean Stanley preached on several occasions in the seventies in the parish church of St. Andrews under the auspices of "A.K.H.B.," and it is even more remarkable that the same pulpit should have been occupied many years later by Dr. Charles Wordsworth, the High Church Bishop of Dunkeld, Perth, and St. Andrews. Any one, however, must be singularly ignorant and unsophisticated who supposes that there has ever been the slightest approach to "reunion," for the moon will fall before Anglicans and Presbyterians come together.

The Prime Minister has appointed the Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal to the canonry of Windsor which was vacated last Thursday by Lord Normanby. Dr. Sheppard was for some years a Minor Canon of Windsor, so he is no stranger to St. George's Chapel. He succeeded the Rev. Francis Garden as Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal in 1884, and he also holds the office of Sub-Almoner to the King, and is one of the three Deputy Clerks of the Closet. Dr. Sheppard was for several years a Priest in Ordinary to Queen Victoria. The canonry is worth £1,000 a year, with a very nice house in the Cloisters of the Castle. The departure of Lord Normanby is much regretted, and he will be missed in the pulpit of St. George's Chapel, as he was far and away the best preacher in the present Chapter of Windsor. Dr. Sheppard has been appointed to this stall by the wish of the King.

I have received a copy of the last annual report of the Charity Voting Reform Association, of Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge-road, and it is satisfactory to see that the movement for suppressing the system of selecting the beneficiaries of charitable institutions by the votes of the subscribers continues to make headway. But the system still flourishes in far too many institutions, and those who appreciate the objections to it ought to support the work of the Charity Voting Reform Association. The practice of electing beneficiaries is, I believe, unknown outside this country, and flourishes chiefly in London. The only conceivable reason for it is to supply people with a motive for subscribing other than that of disinterested benevolence. But for every subscriber who values the voting privilege, I should think that a dozen must regard it as an unmitigated nuisance, and I wonder that the subscribers themselves do not agitate for its abolition in those institutions which still keep up the system.

DANCING: A SHORT CUT TO ——?

A Baptist minister, I read,
A man of very sombre creed,
  Last week his flock did tell,
That in the valse's giddy whirl
There lay for man, and eke for girl,
  The shortest cut to Hell.

To me the view's absurdly false;
At least, when I with Phyllis waltz
  (Her age is ten plus seven),
'Tis just the other way about;
I find therein, beyond a doubt,
  The shortest cut to—Heaven.

I have been studying the second volume of Sir Ian Hamilton's "Staff Officer's Scrap Book," which Mr. Arnold published the other day, and I think I know now as much about the doings of Kuroki's army, and the why and wherefore of each doing, as if I had commanded it myself. The second volume is quite as readable to the mere civilian as the first, and I should think even more instructive to the military man, in proportion as it deals with more complicated and difficult operations. The only matter for regret about it is that Sir Ian Hamilton did not remain in Manchuria to the end of the campaign—he left on February 5, 1905, on appointment to his command at home. He wields the pen of a ready writer, and his keen power of observation has not been exercised on military matters alone. Consequently, among the most interesting passages in his book are the sidelights and casual comments on the phases of national character and method which contributed so much to the success of the Japs.

It is interesting to have this book side by side with Kuropatkin's commentaries on his Manchurian campaign. In several instances the Russian General has remarked that at different times the Japanese might have done this or might have done that if they had known. But is he in a position to judge? General Hamilton records the capture on one occasion, among other Russian documents, of a statement dated Harbin, July 31, 1904, setting forth the strength of the Japanese forces. It put Kuroki's army at just double its true strength, and credited him with a complete cavalry brigade, the only basis for which, in hard fact, was a single squadron! One finds General Hamilton here and there surprised at the way the Russians missed their opportunities; but perhaps had he seen both sides of the field of war he would have understood it easily. No doubt the Japanese Intelligence Department was vastly better informed than the Russian; but there could have been little conception on their side of the state of chaos, demoralisation, and insubordination which Kuropatkin has been describing to an astonished public.

There appeared in the Gazette of February 22 a notification that "the announcement relating to Lieut.-Colonel and Hon. Colonel C. H. Rees (3rd Royal Welsh Fusiliers) which appeared in London Gazette of December 5, 1902, is cancelled." A most indefensible official proceeding, which was severely condemned in TRUTH of April 23, 1903, is rectified by this order. Some of my readers will doubtless remember the story. Colonel Rees was the highly popular commanding officer of a highly efficient Volunteer battalion, on which he had spent a great deal of money. On his retirement after a long command, the War Office surcharged him with certain regimental expenses which had been incurred, to the amount of about £170. Colonel Rees disputed his liability, and refused to pay. After long deliberation, he was informed by Mr. Brodrick that unless he paid the money he would not be allowed to retain his rank on retirement or to receive the Volunteer decoration. He declined to be coerced in this way, and was deprived of his rank and decoration accordingly. As pointed out in Truth, if the money was legally due to the War Office, the proper course—and the only course fair to the taxpayer—was to sue the Colonel for it; while if it was not legally due it was an abuse of official power to try and extort payment by threatening the man with military disgrace. This view of the matter has, after four years' delay, been recognised at Headquarters, and I congratulate Mr. Haldane as well as Colonel Rees on the result.

It was announced the other day, in connection with changes in the officering of the Army Service Corps, that it is proposed to create a larger number of quartermasters in place of lieutenants, and to throw the Army Service Corps open to all branches of the Army for commissions from the ranks, in order to compensate for the suppression of a certain number of such commissions by the abolition of the rank of riding-master. This seems a very sensible arrangement. If it is to be carried out, it is to be hoped that in promoting to new quartermasterships preference will be given to the men who have been the longest recommended for promotion. Some have been waiting a very long time. I have my eye upon one sergeant-major who has been on the list for promotion for no less than seven years, and other cases of the same kind have been mentioned in Truth before now.

According to a correspondent in South Africa, N.C.O.s in certain corps serving abroad are really losing the opportunity of re-engaging as required by the Army Order on proficiency pay, and are in consequence losing their service pay without getting any equivalent, although when this grievance was noticed in Truth before Christmas, I was assured that such cases had been provided for, and that no such result would arise. This is what my informant says:—

> In some corps (A.S.C., for instance) the re-engagement has to be sent home to the Officer in charge of Records, in accordance with Standing Orders, to ask whether there is any objection. This means a delay of at least seven weeks between the time when the man applies to re-engage and the date when the application is approved, with the result that the man loses his service pay and receives nothing in lieu, although he may have applied and signed his agreement long before the order was published at home. Soldiers of the Royal Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry are permitted to re-engage without any other authority than that of their C.O.s.

There is evidently something wrong here, and it ought to be put right.

The Naval Estimates for next year show on paper a reduction of a little less than 1½ millions, though the taxpayer does not immediately benefit by anything like that amount. It is true this is largely arrived at by reduction of the vote for new construction; but why is this? Because we, who do not challenge other States, have just completed a new ship which is so large and expensive as to defy competition for the moment, and construction abroad is temporarily checked pending another advance. Meantime, though spending less, we announce that we are going to start on two larger and improved ships of the same type. What is this but challenge upon challenge, and resulting in increase of armaments and increased expenditure all round? As I read all this, it means that the present Government has not the courage to set the example of reducing armaments. I am not saying that it may not be wise in its generation. Unless the country is prepared to support such a policy, a Government which initiated it would be sacrificing itself for an idea. All I am pointing out is that while the British Government and country are in this frame of mind about the Navy, it is futile, if not discreditable, for a British delegate to preach disarmament at the Hague.

As readers interested in the subject will doubtless have noticed, Mr. Morley was interrogated last week by Sir Seymour King respecting the management of the Indian Family Pension Fund. It is satisfactory to know from the reply that the Secretary of State's attention "has been drawn to certain articles in the public press," and no doubt he will appreciate the points that have been raised in them. Sir Seymour King also elicited that the last quinquennial valuation of the Fund has been completed by the official actuary, and will be published in due course; but the explanations given by Mr. Morley as to the reasons why it should take from March, 1903, to March, 1907 to perform this operation are very far from convincing, and if I know Mr. Morley aright he will find means of expediting the process when the 1908 valuation becomes due. There are many other points in connection with this fund besides mere actuarial calculations which will probably be the better for his personal attention.

> 35. Subject to these limitations and conditions, a gratuity not exceeding one month's pay for each year of service may be granted to any person of less than ten years' continuous service if his services are dispensed with, or, if being placed on the fixed establishment of the Civil Service, he is compelled to leave the service from infirmity of mind or body, or is found unfit to discharge the duties of his office.

From a case that has been brought under my notice, typical of a number that have occurred, it is evident that this regulation is the subject of a good deal of misapprehension among servants of the British South Africa Company. Last year, in pursuance of a policy of retrenchment, the administration dispensed with the services of a number of men. One of them had been employed for nine years as a storekeeper in the Transport Department, B.S.A. Police. He had never seen a copy of the regulations, which were made after he entered the service, but he had always understood that he would be entitled to a gratuity when he left, and his superior officers were apparently under the same impression, for they endorsed his application for such a gratuity and submitted it to the administrator. His Honour replied, however, that he was unable to accept the recommendation, adding that he saw "no difference between this case and thirty or forty others dealt with on reduction of establishment."

I think myself, from a perusal of the regulations, that this claim to a gratuity was technically barred, one of the conditions being that the claimant should have been a contributor to the pension fund. But the regulations —especially the above-quoted No. 35—are so framed that it is quite possible for misconceptions to arise even in the minds of those who read them; and in this case, as I have already mentioned, the applicant had never actually done so, but had relied on hearsay as to their purport. It may be said that he ought to have acquainted himself with the regulations, but during his nine years' service no copy was ever available in the department to which he was attached, and to my mind there is considerable force in his contention that he should have been informed that he must contribute to the pension fund if he wished to qualify merely for a gratuity, not a pension. No doubt the shareholders of the company will be gratified to hear of the efforts that are being made to reduce the expenses of the administration. I scarcely think, however, that they would desire to see more or less trumpery economies effected at the cost of hardship and injustice to the humbler servants of the company.

Mention was made in TRUTH a few months ago of an obnoxious circular emanating from Berlin which had been widely distributed by post in England, being an advertisement of a book by one Carl Buttenstedt. This thing is again in evidence, and as it is delivered in open envelopes it is a source of widespread annoyance, and at the same time one which the General Post Office can easily deal with if it chooses. Those who complain of having such filth shot into their houses by a Government Department would therefore do well to make forcible representations on the subject to the Postmaster-General. Like all blackguards in the same line of business, the advertiser professes sham scientific and philanthropic motives. How much this pretence is worth is shown by the fact that the circular was addressed the other day to all the officers of a certain regiment.

As an instance of excessive zeal in the collection of taxes, a correspondent forwards a letter from an Inland Revenue officer at Felstead. The officer writes to the present owner of a country house pointing out that though he has taken out certain dog licences, those taken out by the former occupier of the place (who left in 1905) have not been renewed. "Will you kindly inform me," the letter proceeds, "if the dogs have now left Mr. ———, and, if in England, where they are now kept?" It is all to the advantage of those who pay the taxes for which they are liable that vigilance should be shown in preventing evasions. Surely, however, zeal is carried too far when a man is asked to give information as to the whereabouts of two dogs which the previous occupier of his house took away two years ago.

AS EASY AS LYING.

And so Municipal Reformers
Have been of seats successful stormers,
Whose victory's proved (there's no denying)
As easy, shall we say, as—lying.

Doubtless many of my readers contributed to the great triumph of "Municipal Reform" last Saturday, and are now rejoicing over "the end of the Wastrels." I would not mar their satisfaction. Indeed, I hope that it is all for the best, and that we shall have our rates going down like a barometer before a blizzard in the course of a few months. But for the reasons mentioned last week, my hopes are not precisely exuberant. "Municipal Reform" was all on top and the "Wastrels" all underneath in the Borough Council elections last November. I see that since that date the rates have risen 4d. in Paddington, 2d. in Islington, and 1d. in Lewisham, and that in half-a-dozen other Moderate strongholds estimated increases are in sight ranging from the above amounts up to a shilling. Absit omen!

A few months ago I was inclined to think that a change of government in Spring Gardens might not be without its advantages. There were little schisms in the Progressive ranks which adversity might heal. The band of municipal statesmen who have done such admirable work since 1889 was passing away to other spheres of one kind and another. A Liberal majority is in power in Parliament to check reactionary projects in the County Council; and altogether the time seemed favourable for one of those changes of party which are bound to come sooner or later, and have their uses.

But the way the change has been engineered is an ugly feature about it. The magnificent victory of last week looks too much like a victory of what American vulgarians call Boodle. Money has been spent to win it as money has never before been spent in a municipal election fight in this country. It has come from mysterious sources, but some of them are pretty well known. Some of it has been shown to have passed through the hands of the press, which is one of the ugliest features of all. To expect municipal purity and disinterested regard for public interests from a par returned on boodle is rather like looking for figs thistles.

Another unpleasant feature in the ings is the atrocious libelling of councillors. Whether its policy has wrong, thrifty or unthrifty, the L.C. posed hitherto of men above reproach .

and character—I am not speaking of one side only. It is not easy to get such men, for the work is arduous and thankless; and it is certain to become harder and harder if, when their efforts fail to give satisfaction, they are to be assailed with such venomous abuse and calumny as the London daily press has been filled with for the past few weeks.

The most extraordinary revelations of County Council mismanagement that I have ever heard of were given by the Daily Chronicle last week in an article on the work of the County Council of Surrey. According to the Chronicle, the Surrey County rate in 1901 was 4⅜d. in the £. In 1902 it had risen to 6⅜d. After the passing of the Education Act of that year it bounded up in three years to 1s. 8¼d., and now stands at 1s. 5¾d. What is done with the money, Heaven alone knows. There are no county fire brigades, no parks or open spaces, the Small Holdings Act is a dead letter, the staff of inspectors under the Sanitary, Factories, and Weights and Measures Acts is described as hopelessly inadequate. The Council holds only five short meetings a year, to register the decisions of its committees. A Local Government Board auditor complains that committees and sub-committees do not see bills, or give orders, but merely confirm payments in totals after they have been made. There seems room for some really useful agitation against "Wastrels" here; but I fear the Wastrels in this case are "Moderates."

TO CHARLEY MATHEWS—CONGRATULATIONS.

And so the Ancient Bailey's gone,
The old is changed to new;
And he who there as leader shone,
His style has changed, too.

But, rank despite, the man's the man;
And, to his life's finale,
Sir Charles will still, as he began,
Remain our genial "Charley."

The new legal appointments are in every respect excellent. Sir Henn Collins has fully justified the expectations formed when he became Master of the Rolls, and the House of Lords loses nothing in judicial strength by his succession to Lord Davey. Sir H. Cozens-Hardy is one of the shrewdest judges as well as the soundest lawyers on the Bench, and his appointment as Master of the Rolls will be universally approved. Mr. Justice Kennedy has also, by general consent, earned his promotion to the Court of Appeal. I am sorry to say that my personal recollections of him are painful, for he tried one of the few actions that have ever cost me a considerable sum in damages; but as I was altogether in the wrong, and was in fact in the position of having to plead guilty to an unfortunate accident, his Lordship was happily innocent of all share in my misfortune.

The spirit of indulgent complacency with which the Great Unpaid too frequently listen to ghastly details of cruelty is strikingly illustrated in the case heard at Chester which heads my Legal Pillory this week, and how vastly different is the emotion excited in the breast of Shallow by contemplation of the poacher's depravity is made clear by the sentence in the case at Chorley placed opposite to it. Another remarkable contrast is afforded by the cases heard at Dunfermline, from which it would appear that an assault upon a street lamp is, from the point of view of the worthy Sheriff, an offence meriting exactly the same punishment as a brutal assault upon a wife. For the rest my Pillory contains a number of examples of vicious punishments inflicted for the crime of poverty and two instances where magistrates have done their best to increase the criminal population of this country by sending first offenders to gaol.

Chester Police-court. Before Dr. Stolterfoth and Alderman R. Lamb. Henry Brown, charged with cruelty to a cat. He beat it, knocking out both eyes, and smashing the jaw and right shoulder. Fined 5s. and costs.

Paisley Police-court. Before Bailie Stewart. Andrew Clark, charged with cruelty to a horse by beating it severely with the thong and handle of a whip. Fined £2.

Dunfermline Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Sherman. Thomas Graham, charged with assaulting his wife. He caught her by the throat, struck her on the face and body, and bit her on the hand. Fined £1, with £1 caution, or 16 days' imprisonment.

Salisbury Petty Sessions. Before the Mayor and Messrs. Atkins, Brown, Haskins, and Woodrow. Frederick Dayman, drover, charged with cruelty to a calf only a week old by striking it with a heavy stick because it could not keep up with other beasts. Fined 15s.

Castleford Petty Sessions. William Dickinson, charged with assaulting John Bond. Dickinson struck Bond with a stone, knocked him down, and kicked him. He was rendered insensible, had two teeth knocked out, and his face severely cut. Fined £2 10s.

Wirksworth Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. C. E. B. Bowles and A. E. Broster. Samuel Repton, charged with assaulting Ethel Makins, aged 17, whom he met on the road at night. The Bench said such assaults on young girls must be stopped, and imposed a fine of 40s. and costs.

Derby County Police-court. Before Messrs. G. W. Peach, E. S. Milnes, W. G. Copestake, W. B. Woodforde, W. Mallilieu, E. Elsey, and J. Smedley. J. Bainbridge, charged with assaulting Martha Townsend. He struck her a violent blow in the eye, necessitating medical attention. Fined £2 and costs.

Chorley Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. Whitehead, R. L. Crosse, and G. T. Brown. James Wilkinson, charged with being found in possession of a rabbit, a net, and pegs on the highway. Fined £5.

Perth Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Sym. M. Gilhooly and W. Irvine, charged with being on the river bank of the Tay intending to take salmon. Fined £3 7s. 6d. each or 20 days.

Dunfermline Sheriff Court. Robert Hodge, charged with breaking a street lamp by throwing bottles at it. Fined £1, with £1 caution.

Before Sheriff Sherman. J. Close, charged with day poaching. Fined £2 10s., or 20 days' imprisonment.

Torquay Police-court. Before Mr. W. B. Smale. J. Riley, charged with peddling picture postcards without a certificate. Seven days.

Haywards Heath Petty Sessions. Percy Edward Brown, charged with sleeping out in a brickfield. Three months' hard labour.

Rugby Police-court. Percy Bradley, aged 15, charged with stealing a gold watch, value £6. A first offence. One month's hard labour.

Fakenham Petty Sessions. Before Mr. C. A. Hamond, Rev. J. Lee Warner, and Mr. W. Frewer. C. Steward, charged with stealing a larch pole, value 6d. Seven days.

Broxton Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Howard, Langley, Vernon, and Jones. Frank Rowlands, charged with stealing a spade, value 3s. Two months' hard labour.

St. Augustine's Petty Sessions. J. Gregory, charged with trespass in pursuit of rabbits. Fined 40s. and costs.

Saffron Walden Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Tuke, Brown, Gibson, Midgley, and Robson. William Fitch, charged with stealing a fowl. A first offence. One month's hard labour.

Winchester Petty Sessions. Before Captain Mitchell. W. Richardson, charged with stealing watercress. Fourteen days.

Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—Secretary, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

Grantham Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and Councillor T. Rowle. Timothy Newcome, charged with cruelty to a horse. It was suffering from skin disease, its knees were broken and raw, there were sores on the withers and ribs, it was given nothing to eat, and was exposed to the cold weather. Fined 30s.

Birmingham Police-court. Before Alderman Lloyd and Mr. S. G. Middleton. Elizabeth Wisdom, charged with sleeping in an outhouse. One month.

Colchester Police-court. Before Messrs. Goody, Laver, and E. T. Smith. E. Bridges, A. Loven, and C. Wright, charged with not performing their tasks at the workhouse. Bridges, a month's, the others 14 days' hard labour.

Lutterworth Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. C. Marriott and L. T. Topham. Ernest Pike, charged with poaching on October 12, 1901. He had absconded after being seen with two other men in a field with nets, in which rabbits were caught. Two months' imprisonment and a further six months in default of finding sureties.

Ilfracombe Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. P. Verney, R. Lake, W. H. Gould, W. Brooks, and F. Anderton. George and Eva Dennis, charged with ill-treating the daughter of the female defendant. The child was continually beaten by her mother. On one occasion she was struck with a poker, and, falling down, broke her arm, and, to escape further ill-treatment, tried to drown herself. The woman fined £5, the case against the man dismissed.

At Southport Police court last week, a Bench consisting of Messrs. T. Hough and W. Hulme, Dr. Earnshaw and Dr. Arthur Wood, heard an application by a local architect under the conscientious objection clause of the Vaccination Act. He was clearly entitled to a certificate of exemption, but, as their remarks showed, the two doctors are opposed to the granting of such certificates, and the other magistrates being apparently mere dummies on the Bench in cases of this kind, the application was refused. "We cannot compel you to have the child vaccinated," said Dr. Earnshaw, "but we can refuse the certificate of exemption." In other words, their worships refused to give effect to the plain intention of the Act of Parliament. Medical men who cannot approach the matter with an open mind ought to be debarred from adjudicating on these applications, but fortunately an amendment of the law will soon render it impossible for magistrates to treat conscientious objectors with such gross injustice.

A familiar swindle has recently been worked, with great success to the operators and disastrous results to the victims, in the name of the Empress Gold Paint and Speciality Company, Ltd., 12, Station-road, Finsbury Park. The trick consists in advertising for employees at a tempting remuneration, and making them take shares in the company, the business of the company being at best microscopical, and the agreed salary not being forthcoming after the first few weeks. I have particulars of three cases in which men, all practically of the working class, have paid £50 for shares under such circumstances between April of last year and January of this. In each case the shares transferred to them were those of Mr. Lewis Rogers, the managing director, who engaged the men, and is apparently the only person actively connected with it.

One of the three men—who was caught by a newspaper advertisement, and engaged at a salary of £2 a week and rooms rent free, valued at 10s. a week—took up his post at the beginning of May, and seems to have remained till the third week in June, when his salary was three weeks in arrear, in addition to which Rogers had borrowed £2 of him. He took away with him Rogers's I.O.U. for £8, but the money has never been paid, Rogers pleading impecuniosity, although he has since unloaded £100 worth of shares for cash on the first man's successors.

Victim No. 2 was caught early in August on similar terms to the last, and left the company in the second week of September, with three weeks' salary owing to him. He went to Rogers to demand the return of his £50, and Rogers personally assaulted him. The shareholder took out a summons against the managing director, and Rogers was fined 40s. and costs at North London Police-court. The magistrate's sentence did not, of course, pay the wages due to the complainant. Nor did Rogers. The last application for payment of the debt produced the following letter, nominally from the secretary to the company, but evidently written by Rogers himself:—

> Replying to your p.card to hand this day, asking us to settle up re wages, etc., we beg to inform you that the costs of the police court proceedings incurred by our Mr. Rogers in the course of the execution of his duties here will be duly debited to you after a resolution to be passed at a board meeting to be held next week, when a statement of same will be duly sent to you, and you will be required to pay the amount less what is to your credit on the books of this company.

It will be seen that Rogers is a cool hand, as well as a bit of a humorist. He suggests that the assaulting of dissatisfied shareholders is all "in the course of the execution of his duties"; and when he is ordered to pay a fine and costs by a police magistrate, he proposes to send in a bill for the amount to the complainant.

The last of the three victims paid his £50 to Rogers and took up his duties on January 28, and I am not sure whether he has actually determined his agreement. But he makes one of the most interesting statements in the story. In the first four weeks of his engagement the orders amounted to 45s., or 11s. 3d. per week. This bears out a statement made by Rogers on January 24 in a letter to victim No. 1, that the report of the police-court proceedings had "just about killed the goose." Nevertheless, he contrived to make the dying bird lay another golden egg to the value of £50 on January 28, as above mentioned. The reader can judge for himself the character of this transaction, and of the whole business. The victims seem to think they have no remedy, their observations having satisfied them that the company and its managing director are not worth powder and shot. All that can be done, therefore, is to warn others.

"Dear Friend,—We have good news for you" is the form of address adopted by the latest recruit to the ranks of shoddy watch vendors, the Goldoid Watch Association, of 88, Chancery-lane. The "good news" is the information that a Goldoid watch and chain is reserved for the recipient of the circular, and will be forwarded upon receipt of 5s. 11d. This stale trick ought to be nearly played out by this time.

A resident at Earl's Court writes that his wife was called upon the other day by a well-dressed young man, who related a pitiful story of illness, non-employment, and poverty, but stated that he had been promised a situation with a firm of tea merchants in the Minories if he could sell a certain quantity of their tea during the week. The lady gave an order, and her husband wishes to learn whether she was tricked. Of course, I cannot speak as to this particular case, but I know that for years past dodges of this kind have been extensively practised in connection with the tea trade, especially in the suburbs. By thus appealing to the sympathies of housewives the canvassers book a good many orders which would never be obtained on the merits of the article they sell, and there is little doubt that the firms for whom they tout are parties to the trick. Usually no payment is required till the tea is delivered, and the fact that no attempt is made to secure a second order shows pretty conclusively that it is, to all intents and purposes, a bogus business. The tea is generally rubbish worth nothing like the price that is charged for it.

Signs and portents of the approach of another racing season are to be seen in the increasing vigour with which the hungry horde of touting tipsters are taking up the pursuit of their prey. One of the first in the field is that many-aliased rascal E. W. Beston, of Birmingham, who, in the character of "James Brown," is issuing circulars which are choice specimens of the childish clap-trap with which credulous backers are gulled. The mythical Brown, who talks of his "unique" and "influential" and "powerful" position on the Turf, has several different baits in his trap for greenhorns. There is "a grand starting price job," price 10s. "All must have a Fearless Splash on this Matchless Certainty," but in case all do not care to spend 10s. even "to win a fortune," he offers for the same day "a popular 5s. double"—both these horses also being absolutely certain winners.

On the other hand, if the greenhorns are disposed to have what Brown would call a "fearless splash" on his tips, he is willing to send them "next week's £25 all day wires for £10," this vast reduction in the usual charge being made because he is "sanguine of another terrific triumph." In a separate prospectus he announces that for five guineas down he will not only furnish particulars of "James Brown's Long-shot Certainty Method" of finding winners, but also "a full week's £5 specials." We hear a good deal about the physical deterioration of the race. The fact, however, that we have in our midst a host of brainless idiots who allow themselves to be fooled and swindled by such gentry as Beston suggests that the question of mental decadence is of more pressing importance.

The irrepressible M. Pizzey, of Ascot, who now styles himself "The World's Premier Selectionist," is also on the war-path. He heads his latest effusion with the following:—

"No pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth."—Francis Bacon.

This strikes me as a singularly inept quotation for Pizzey, of all men, to use. The vantage ground of truth, forsooth! It is rather in the pillory of Truth that this false prophet of the Turf is accustomed to stand, and I scarcely think that he has derived any pleasure from his experiences in that position.

"Harry Hyams, of Camden Town," is issuing a circular, in which he announces that all his late agents have been discharged "owing to the new Betting Bill," and that he has opened an office at Flushing where he will execute commissions "for peer and peasant" on the deposit system. I know nothing about Hyams beyond what he says in his circular, but seemingly he has hitherto done business directly or indirectly as a street bookmaker, and he is only one of a number of these gentry who have now started offices on the Continent for the receipt of deposits from backers. But Hyams, like others, intimates that clients can wire their instructions "direct" to his registered telegraphic address in London, or telephone to him there, and it is quite evident that though the money will have to be forwarded to Flushing, the business will be really carried on here. This is, of course, a transparent evasion of the Betting Acts, and in view of the increasing extent to which it is being practised I would once more commend the matter to the attention of the police.

Hundreds of men at Oxford—many of them being still infants in the eye of the law—were last week circularised by a firm of bookmakers named Morris and Calder, 19, Air-street, Regent-street, W. I trust that the authorities of the University will consider the advisability of prosecuting Messrs. Morris and Calder. Under Lord Herschell's Act a person sending a betting circular to a youth at any university, college, or school, is deemed to have known that such youth was an infant, unless he (the sender) proves that he had reasonable ground for believing that he was of full age. It would be manifestly difficult, if not impossible, for the bookmakers to prove that they had this reasonable ground in the case of all these circulars.

Robert H. P. Wilson, the begging-letter writer to whom I recently referred, is now specially appealing to the charity of civil engineers, on the ground that his late father was an eminent member of the same profession. He tells the same old story of his privations, and solicits the purchase of tickets for the same old benefit concert. "Our future," he says, "rests on the success of the concert; if a failure, ruin, and I shall have to end my days in the workhouse infirmary." Before that fate overtakes him, however, I think it is probable that Wilson will pass some more of his days in gaol, for he is an incorrigible rogue and vagabond who has already undergone six months' hard labour and three years' penal servitude. For the information of the police, I may mention that his present address is Trematon Cottage, Albany-road, S. Merstham—not Streatham, as erroneously stated in my last paragraph.

In the TRUTH "Cautionary List" for this year will be found the name of one Charles M. Clarke. Clarke is a person with a shady record, who styles himself "LL.D.," and was last year caught in the act of cadging for samples of the goods of the Ardath Tobacco Company under pretence that he desired to write an article on smoking mixtures in an alleged publication called Dramatic Opinion, of which he represented himself to be the editor. I recently heard of this individual again under much the same circumstances, through Messrs. Angus Watson and Co., of Newcastle-on-Tyne. This firm deals extensively in sardines, and for sardines Clarke was this time fishing. It seems desirable, therefore, to repeat the warning that has been given against his fishy operations, for the benefit of all business firms.

Messrs. Angus Watson and Co. tell me that they are incessantly pestered with applications of this character for samples of goods, generally from individuals professing to be in the medical profession. Within about two months they have heard from about twenty gentlemen sporting medical degrees, and all fishing for sardines. The nuisance has grown to such an extent that they recently communicated with the police at Manchester and Derby respecting two medical fishermen within their jurisdiction. In the Manchester case the police reported that the alleged medico was residing in a common lodging-house; in the Derby case the report was that he was an advertisement canvasser, who, when interviewed by the police, explained that he had written on behalf of a friend. Doubtless many large business firms are subject to similar attentions from parties who live by their wits, and it is a pity they do not take steps to discourage the practice. If they are not disposed to take stronger measures, I would advise that all communications of this nature be referred at once to the Editor of TRUTH.

It was suggested in these columns a few weeks ago, apropos of the Jamaica earthquake, that Mr. Hugh Clements's theories of such phenomena are deserving of more respect than they have received. One of my readers now forwards a forecast by Mr. Clements for last month, and suggests that the publication of such prophecies should be forbidden in the interest of nervous folk. Mr. Clements certainly seems, on the face of it, to have been rather at sea in his predictions of earthquakes for February; but it must be remembered that trifling earthquakes occur frequently without attracting much attention. As a prophet Mr. Clements has frequently "come off" in a very remarkable way, and he attempts what neither the Meteorological Office nor any one else in the same line of business considers possible. While it seems clear that his method is imperfect, and does not reckon with all the forces that are at work, I think that results justify him sufficiently to warrant one in saying that there is something in his theory worth considering.

I read an article the other day in a New York commercial paper about the wealth of the United States. The writer put down the total valuation at 107,000,000,000 dollars—an amount, he said, more than twice that of the United Kingdom; and this, he continued, did not take into account the value of undeveloped resources. He then proceeded to advise the "regulation of swollen fortunes" by making all property above a certain limit revert to the State on the death of the owner. This proposal is often made on our side of the Atlantic, and I certainly think that something will have to be done to restrict accumulations in the hands of individuals, for beyond a certain point they constitute a danger to the community. The mistake is, however, often made of supposing that if a progressive income tax or progressive death duties on a high scale were adopted, the revenue derived from them would be perpetual. It should be obvious that this could not be, for each year, by the action of this fiscal mill, the number of great fortunes would be reduced, and consequently the income derivable from this source.

There is an Italian proverb which says, "Money and sanctity, the half of the half"; and I know nothing which is more exaggerated than the estimate made of other people's incomes. There are, of course, some very rich men in most countries. But if any one looks into the income tax returns, and the amounts of the fortunes which pay death dues, he will find that there are comparatively very few persons who leave above £100,000 on their death. And yet, to hear people talk, one would suppose that millionaires are as plentiful as blackberries. I would have a proportional income tax, calculated on such a scale that it would not lead rich men to settle in some other country. But I would allow no man to inherit more than £50,000 from another, and I would make the State the heir of £10,000 if he has £100,000, and one per cent. in addition on his second £100,000, two per cent. in addition on £200,000, and so on. An inheritance of £50,000 would bring in an annual revenue of a trifle over £1,500 per annum without risk. This ought to content anybody. Should he wish to have a larger income, he might either earn a salary, or with his £50,000 engage in some commercial undertaking. No one with an annual income of £1,500, who has only condescended to be born, could complain of his fate, for he would be far better off than the vast majority of human beings.

Supposing that a person leaves a million, the State would, under the above scale, come in for £145,000. The owner would, therefore, have to divide the remainder into sixteen parts, and could only leave one part to any one person. If he had only five children he would have to select eleven other persons. I doubt whether such a law would prevent a man from heaping up the million if he could, but were he to spend a great portion of it whilst alive, this would be no disadvantage to the community. I remember suggesting this fiscal scheme to the late Sir William Harcourt, when he was discussing his death duties. But he did not take kindly to it. For my part, I thoroughly believe in its wisdom and in its expediency.

The Brigg election is one of those afflictions which seem to be sent upon Governments by a beneficent Providence as a reminder of the wrath to come. It is well for all of us to remember that we are mortal, but particularly so for Ministers, whose lease of life is shorter. They should live with one eye ever fixed upon the grave, and in a lively consciousness that only by mercy, not by merit, can they escape damnation. Thus will they be stimulated to good works, strengthened in grace and humility, and saved from the pride which goeth before a fall, as also from all other snares of the enemy.

The electors of Brigg seem to have a particular faith in this kind of discipline. A vacancy occurred when the last Liberal Government was in office, and they promptly returned a recruit for the Opposition in place of a supporter of the Government. When the same Parliament was dissolved in 1895, and the whole country was going for the Unionists, Brigg changed its mind and returned a Liberal. It returned him again by a larger majority when the Unionists were sweeping the country in 1900, notwithstanding that every vote given for a Liberal at that juncture was a vote for the Boers. Why it returned him again by a still larger majority in 1906 it is difficult to say, but apparently local associations and personal attachment count for a good deal in the constituency. The member who had been supported so consistently through thick and thin now retires, and Brigg once more goes over pretty solidly to the Opposition. The new member is a popular man of great local influence, and apparently this and the local tradition of being "agin' the Government" explain the result. All that can be said for certain about the verdict of such a constituency is that it is not much guide to the general feeling of the country.

LORDS AND LADIES.

The Brigg election, Tories find,
A signal proof affords
Of what's the British Public's mind
About the House of Lords.

The Suffragettes—that frantic crew—
Proclaim, with joyful throats,
It shows The Nation's favouring view
Towards down-trod women's votes.

Suppose that both the mark should hit?
In prospect then displayed is
A House of Lords retained to sit Upon a House of Ladies.

Here is another letter from an anti-suffrage lady:—

In the current number of Truth you advise women who do not want the vote to make their voices heard; but how are we to do so if we flatly refuse to scream aloud in public or private? My name appears in "Who's Who," and my youngest daughter is a graduate of Girton, and we have both been inundated by the detestable "Suffragettes" with petitions to sign and with applications of all kinds. I always write and plainly tell these misguided females what I think of them. But the letters still come. I have never once been approached by the other side. Yet among my many women friends I do not know one who wishes to vote, and who does not regard the whole movement with rage and despair. What can we do to demonstrate that the majority of women are still sane and decent?

When I advised women to "make their voices heard" I was under the impression that this was a task they were quite equal to. If they really do not know how to do it, I hardly feel competent to instruct them, and perhaps they may be better without this knowledge. However, it seems a pity that the "suffragettes" should have all the shouting to themselves; and as I understand that sundry women's petitions to Parliament in opposition to the suffrage movement are now in preparation, I am endeavouring to obtain particulars of them, and I hope to be able to give the necessary information next week for the benefit of the voiceless sex.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's article in the Nation on the limitation of armaments is admirable in language and intention, but beyond the encouragement it gives to the friends of peace throughout the world to find a British premier speaking so plainly and hopefully, I doubt if much good will come of it. Already we hear it criticised in Germany as hypocritical or Machiavellian, and this is really not surprisng. Sir Henry urges that we have "given earnest of our sincerity by the reductions that have been effected in our military and naval expenditure"; but the reductions, such as they are, are accompanied by the most positive assurances on the part of the Government that the strength of both Army and Navy has been increased, not diminished, in spite of the reduction of expenditure. Sir Henry expects this to be believed at home, and he cannot expect that it will not be believed in Germany, where the most unfavourable view of our words and actions always find ready acceptance. How, then, can the Germans fail to regard it as hypocritical to appeal to the reduction of expenditure as evidence that we are really reducing our armaments?

Next to Germany, the desirability of reducing armaments must chiefly be preached to France. In France any move in this direction is at present regarded with alarm, nor, looking at her position in relation to Germany, can this be wondered at. Our Prime Minister's aspirations consequently evoke no sympathetic response in France. Personally, I am by no means unsympathetic, but it is necessary to clear our minds of cant in this matter if any practical result is to be attained. No nation which stands armed to the teeth can preach disarmament to its neighbours without bringing the cause of disarmament into ridicule and contempt. The only preaching which has any chance of success is the preaching by example, not precept.

We are of all nations the worst offenders at present, because we have in late years added more than any other to our expenditure. Our strength is chiefly naval, though there is a movement on foot for greatly increasing our military strength also, and the present Government seems to think it must be played up to. In naval strength we have established a preponderant position in relation to other nations such as no other power aspires to in any branch of its armaments. "The sea power of this country," says the Premier, "implies no challenge to any single State or group of States." We may say so, but how in the name of common sense can we expect any other State which sees a possibility of this power being directed against itself to believe it? Within twenty years we have chosen to increase our sea power, which was little more than equal to that of France, to an equality with that of any two, if not three, foreign nations. Unless other powers are content to leave their coasts and their ocean trade absolutely at our mercy in time of war, how can this be anything but a challenge to them? The only wonder is that the challenge has not been taken up more vigorously.

Some of the Lords are awaking to the fact that the country is not likely to put up much longer with the existence of an Upper Chamber composed of hereditary noblemen—in the main large landowners, and not only Conservatives, but Conservatives in the party sense of the word—and of the Bishops of one particular sect of Christians. In opposition to the proposal to limit their veto on all legislative measures to one session, they make it known that they are prepared to agree to a scheme to strengthen their House, by adding a certain number of nominated Members, and by a selection of those whom they deem the fittest amongst their lordships. Lord Newton has prepared a Bill to give effect to these views, and Lord Curzon, without pronouncing in favour of his brother Peer's Bill, has expressed his general approval of some sort of reform.

Some twenty years ago a Bill was read a first time, with the names of Mr. Brodrick and Mr. Curzon on the back, enabling any M.P. who succeeded to a peerage to decline to become a Member of the Upper House. I remember that they asked me to put my name on the back of it. I thought it reasonable that some useful Member of the House of Commons should not be kicked upstairs against his own will, and I offered to be one of the backers of the Bill, provided that the decision to remain a Commoner was to be final, and the right to re-enter the Upper House should not be retained, as it was in the Bill. This, however, was declined.

Assuming two Chambers to be desirable, the House of Lords, as at present composed, is obviously not such an Upper Chamber as ought to exist in a country where Government is representative, and if we are to continue to have one, its members ought to be elected, with, perhaps, a few nominated members. But the election should be a popular one. An hereditary right to a vote is as absurd as an hereditary right to a seat. The Senate of the United States possesses large powers, but all its members are elected by the several States constituting the Union, and, generally speaking, men are elected who have been long engaged in public affairs. Two are elected for each State, and one sits for seven years and the other for five. In both cases the election is by the local Legislature of the State. By this means there never is a dissolution, but each year a certain number cease to be members, and either their mandate is renewed for another term, or they are replaced by some one else.

We have not State Legislatures, but some such system might be easily adopted in our case. Large senatorial areas might be created, and each would have the right to elect a certain number of Senators based upon representation. To these might be added representatives of the Army and the Navy, of commerce, of trades unions, of chambers of commerce, of those engaged in education, etc., who would be elected by those engaged in such matters, and to these might be added a few nominated members from those who had already served in three or more Parliaments. The respective numbers of these Senators elected from senatorial districts should always largely exceed the two other categories. In regard to the representatives of trade, etc., the term might be for three years and four years. Thus an Upper House would be created that would be representative, and whose views would carry the greatest weight—all the more if no Senator were allowed to form part of any Administration, or to occupy any place of profit or trust in the public service.

The Senate thus constituted would have a suspensory veto of not more than one year at most. Such a period would be amply sufficient for the country to make clear its views in regard to any measure that had passed the House of Commons and had been thrown out in the Upper House. No political institutions are quite perfect. They may be in theory excellent, but in practice holes may be picked in them. For their proper working we must always assume a certain measure of patriotism, and a certain measure of plain common sense.

But before altering the composition of the House of Lords, it will be well to define its powers, and in their intention to do so I hold that the Government are wise. When the veto of the Lords has been limited it will be time enough to consider what is the best way to render it a useful branch of the Legislature within such limitations. I see it said that the House should devote itself to social and such-like legislation, instead of tinkering at the Constitution. This is folly. If the machinery is rotten, no good work is likely to be done by it. Any manufacturer would be of opinion that he must first put his machinery in order before attempting to use it profitably.

THE YOUTH AND THE PIPE.

A Youth, just growing up to Man,
Was seized with Tastes nicotian,
So bought a Pipe, a brand-new Briar,
Wherewith to compass his Desire.
He filled it, lit it, found it drew,
Then vigorous puffed for all he knew;
But soon, with an expressive Frown,
He threw the Thing, disgusted, down;
For, sure, the Taste of burning Wood
Was scarce—to put it mildly—good;
Indeed, unless he'd chucked it quick,
That Flavour rank had turned him sick.
Next Day he went a Friend to see—
A seasoned, veteran Smoker he—
Whose Rack displayed full many a Pipe
With frequent Usage coloured ripe.
"Come choose you one and take a Fill."
Replied his Visitor: "I will."
He chose and filled an ancient Briar,
Applied the Vesta's needful Fire,
Then pulled, half-nervous, lest he should Again be choked with burning Wood.
But soon observe his Face expand
In Smile contented, placid, bland;
For nought of sickening, woody Taste
The Baccy's Flavour now effaced;
Instead, there did his Palate greet
A Bouquet nutty, mellow, sweet.
"Ah! lucky Man, whose Pipes are old,"
He cried, with Envy uncontrolled,
"And so are spared the nauseous Savours
Wherewith new Wood one's Baccy flavours!
"Dear Boy, my Pipes," his Friend returned,
"Would ne'er this mellow Age have earned,
Unless, with Perseverance due,
I'd nerved myself to smoke them new."

SCRUTATOR.

ARMY REFORM AGAIN.

THE more one sees of Mr. Haldane's army proposals the more difficult it is to pick any big hole in them, and this is practically demonstrated by such criticism as the scheme has yet received, both in Parliament and outside. From this statement it is only necessary to except the views of Mr. Arnold-Forster, whose opinion, of course, is that any scheme not devised by himself must necessarily be fatal to the Army and the nation. In two respects I distrust Mr. Haldane's projects myself, but the future alone can say whether there is any reason for such mistrust. In point of fact, Mr. Haldane himself described his scheme as "speculative," and any such scheme necessarily contains a large speculative element. If 78,000 officers and men, practically the equivalent of the present Militia, enrol themselves for the proposed "special contingent," which is to be available for foreign service on mobilisation, and if 300,000 Volunteers and Yeomanry, or whatever they are to be called in future, are forthcoming on the proposed terms for the second line, the scheme will satisfy all military requirements which can be reasonably set up. But it looks such a big "if." Mr. Wyndham, the most intelligent of Mr. Haldane's critics, expressed that view, and many people will share it. I do not say that Mr. Haldane is expecting impossibilities, and he has had the advantage over any outside critic of having explored the regions behind the scenes, where the work of staging the proposed two armies will have to be done. There are some 90,000 men now serving in the Militia on more or less the same terms as are proposed for the auxiliary contingent of the Regular Army. They may continue to serve on the new basis, or others may be found to supply their places. But as far as my observations go, the only militia units which are worth their salt owe their merits to special circumstances connected with the present constitution of the force, of which local traditions and the personal influence of commanding officers are the chief; and when the peculiar circumstances which have kept the Militia alive and flourishing in certain localities are swept away, I shall be surprised if you can still get militia-men as a mere semi-professional adjunct of the foreign service army. So again with the Volunteers and Yeomanry. The Government is going to ask a good deal more of them than is asked at present, and experience has shown that to ask more of the Volunteers is immediately to reduce their numbers. Many people have thought—I am one of them—that it would be a gain in the end to ask more and accept the consequent reduction of numbers, on the principle that a thoroughly efficient and trustworthy force of 150,000 men is worth more at a pinch than an altogether inferior force of 250,000. But Mr. Haldane is like an epicure Oliver Twist, who not only asks for more food, but asks for an improved menu. I wish he may get it, but judging by past experience, I have my doubts.

The second reason for misgiving is on the score of £ s. d. No definite estimate worth consideration of the probable cost of the new elements in the organisation has yet been put forward. We are to postpone that painful subject for another year. In the meantime, however, does anybody suppose that the "special contingent," with its six months' training and its 3,500 officers (yet to be caught), is not going to cost at least twice as much as the old Militia, if it is to be worth anything? Or does anybody suppose that a second line of all arms, field artillery included, 300,000 strong, is going to be formed out of the present auxiliary forces, and properly officered, organised, and equipped with non-combatant services, without a new expenditure of several millions per annum? My own credulity does not run to that length. One of our instructors in military matters takes a favourable view of the whole scheme, having regard to the conditions attending its inception, one of which is that the Secretary of State has only got 28 millions per annum to spend. But as it is quite certain that the scheme is not going to be carried out for 28 millions, its excellence from this point of view will apparently not endure beyond the end of the coming financial year. What I should expect to happen is that when the first bills come to be made out next spring this item and that of the new programme will be modified or postponed out of regard for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that this process will be repeated from year to year. In the meantime, the establishment of the various units will fail to form itself, and as this will suit financial exigencies, no strenuous effort will be made to fill it up. In that case the scheme will remain an ideal dangled before our eyes year after year by Secretaries of State, present or future, as a high ideal towards which the War Office is steadily working so far as circumstances permit; and this will go on until a new scare is got up, and a new army reformer comes into office, when we shall have another scheme. In hazarding this prediction, I lay no claim to the gift of prophecy. Mr. Haldane is very energetic and clear-headed, and has a gift of inspiring others with enthusiasm, which gives him a certain driving force. He may, therefore, be able to force his scheme through where others have failed. But I have seen so many army schemes, and experience has made me pessimistic.

Does it matter very much whether Mr. Haldane's ideas are ever realised in their entirety? The present excitement about the condition of the Army is confined to a somewhat narrow circle, and is attributable entirely to the experience of the Boer war. The Boer war was a blunder in many respects. From the purely military point of view the blunder was that we drifted into the war without ever seriously calculating what sort of military effort it involved. If Governments are going to make wars or drift into wars in that style, the only sort of army that is any use to us is an army equal to that of the biggest military power with whom we may be involved in war at short notice by a bungling Ministry. The lesson of lessons taught by the Boer war is that embodied in the scriptural precept against going to war without previously reckoning whether you have a force which is equal to tackling your enemy. That is a lesson for Cabinets in general, and for Foreign and Colonial Secretaries in particular, rather than for Secretaries of State for War. It is no use, therefore, for people to go about talking at large about the necessity of preparedness for war, as demonstrated by our experience in South Africa. In 1899 we were perfectly prepared for war, if the enemy had been a West African emperor, a Soudanese mahdi, or a Pathan mullah. We were not prepared to undertake the conquest of the Transvaal and Orange Free State. The contingency had not been contemplated, and we had to improvise the machinery at vast trouble, loss, and expense. When, then, we are told by Mr. Haldane or anybody else that we must have a "striking force" of this size or that size ready for prompt mobilisation, the question instantly arises, against whom is it going to strike. Is it going to strike against France, Germany, or Russia? If that is the idea, it is a matter of indifference whether the force is 120,000 strong or 160,000. At either figure it is an equal absurdity for the purpose in view, and the addition of another 40,000 or 50,000 would not make it less so. In the same way, when we come to the second line, in what war is the territorial army going to defend our hearths and homes? The only foreign nations in a position to invade these islands in force are France and Germany. The circumstances under which the territorial army would have to turn out and defend us would only arise if the "striking force" had gone away somewhere—on strike—and we had no regular army left at home behind our fleet. Is it to be seriously contemplated that, being at war with either France or Germany, we should despatch the whole of our military first line to some other part of the world? The suggestion seems an absurdity, and the need of the national army of home defence becomes proportionately distant and speculative. We have been bidden, quite rightly, to betake ourselves to "clear thinking" on military matters. This is the result of my clear thinking. By clear thinking I mean definitely working out the military contingencies against which we have to provide, instead of talking wildly and irrationally about the defenceless condition of the Empire and the necessity for arming and drilling hundreds of thousands of men to protect it from undefined dangers, when its frontiers are guarded at all vital points by a greater naval force than any nation has hitherto possessed.

If we stick to clear thinking, what do we want a striking force for at all? As far as I can see, chiefly because it implies a certain power of doing mischief to other people, without which our diplomacy would not be respected. A navy without an army behind it cannot hurt anybody else seriously. It possesses only a limited power of annoying a well-armed enemy. But a power which commands the sea and can land a formidable military force at distant and unexpected spots without much trouble cannot generally be defied with impunity. We might not be able to invade France, or Germany, or even Turkey, if they fell out with us, but we could annex many of their possessions by means of our "striking force" without much trouble. Then, again, we have land frontiers in Asia and America, and to have no troops for the defence of our possessions in those regions would be to invite our neighbours to seize them if an occasion offered. A portable army is, therefore, necessary in order to prevent other people taking liberties with us under the impression that we cannot do them any harm, which is the same thing as saying in the interest of peace. And, of course, it is necessary to keep uncivilised neighbours in order. If it is to be any good for these purposes, the army must be an efficient and business-like one, capable of doing its work properly within the limited sphere of operations open to it. If it is not all this foreign powers will know the truth very quickly, and turn up their noses at it accordingly. What its precise strength should be is very difficult to say; but I can see no reasonably probable emergency to which the army that we have kept up during the last thirty years would not be equal; and every increase in it beyond that size is simply an inducement to statesmen to suppose that it can be used for purposes to which it is quite unequal and to shape their relations with foreign powers accordingly. Far more important than numbers, therefore, is efficiency. Judging from Mr. Haldane's account of War Office work during the past year, a great deal has been done to secure that end, and concurrently with some saving of money. Let him persevere with his efforts in that direction, and the country will have far more cause to thank him than for the addition of another 20,000 or 30,000 men to a "striking force," and two or three millions more to the Army estimates.

THE EDALJI INQUIRY FIASCO.

Every one familiar with the history of the Edalji case, especially the last chapter of it, will have read with amazement the communication from the Home Office issued to the press on Saturday last. It had been understood, as the result of communications between Sir Conan Doyle and the Home Office, that Mr. Gladstone had promised a full inquiry into all the circumstances attendant on Mr. Edalji's conviction, on the lines of the inquiry held into the Beck case. The only points which were not quite clear were whether the inquiry was to be held in public, and whether it was to extend to the procedure of the Home Office in dealing with the petitions and applications addressed to that department on Mr. Edalji's behalf subsequently to his conviction. It now appears that Sir Robert Romer, Sir Arthur Wilson, and Mr. Lloyd Wharton were nominated by Mr. Gladstone to conduct the inquiry. Sir Robert Romer, however, accepted the office under a misapprehension, as also, it would seem, did his colleagues. Sir Robert supposed that he was only to advise "whether a free pardon should be granted to Mr. Edalji, having regard to the materials in the possession of the Home Office." He found, however, that a general inquiry was contemplated, and possibly a public investigation, and he then withdrew, for the reasons which he thus states:—

> Now, it appears to me that if such an inquiry is embarked on it ought, in order to be satisfactory, to be done according to the ordinary rules of procedure governing a criminal trial. In my view an inquiry of that kind ought to be in public or not at all, and I am not willing to undertake it. May I point out to you some of the difficulties in the way of it? Apart from the objection of a retrial of a criminal charge so long after the conviction, without a jury, there is the question of evidence. Such a committee as you were desirous of appointing would have no power to call witnesses or administer an oath. To make the inquiry effective, witnesses ought to be properly examined and cross-examined. I think that the committee ought not to take upon itself the duty of cross-examination, and if counsel be employed, the question arises who would act as counsel for the prosecution, and by whom would he be instructed. It appears to be thought that the inquiry in the Beck case was analogous to the present, but in that case the innocence of the convict was assumed, and no question of a trial for a criminal offence arose. At any rate, speaking for myself, I do not see my way to act, as it were, as judge and jury in trying the particular question of the guilt or innocence of Mr. Edalji, and that without any proper legal power of summoning witnesses.

Sir Robert adds that Sir Arthur Wilson and Mr. Wharton have seen this letter and entirely concur in it. It is natural that they should do so. The extraordinary part of the story is what follows. It seems that the three gentlemen subsequently offered to undertake the limited functions which Sir Robert Romer supposed in the first instance were all that he was to perform, namely, "to examine the material in the possession of the Home Office, and to give their advice on the case to the Home Secretary." This offer Mr. Gladstone accepted. Private circumstances subsequently compelled Sir Robert Romer's withdrawal; Sir Albert de Rutzen took his place; and "the examination of the papers is now proceeding."

It is decidedly strange that these gentlemen should have been appointed to act on a committee without understanding what they were to do; and that what they were really intended to do should have been open to the very obvious objections which Sir Robert Romer states in the above letter. But, without discussing this point further, the amazing thing is that the promised inquiry into the Edalji case should now have resolved itself into an examination of papers in the possession of the Home Office. What good purpose such a proceeding is expected to serve I am at a loss to imagine. It seems to come to this, that Mr. Edalji is to be tried again in camerâ on a secret official dossier on the strength of which successive Home Secretaries have three times over refused to pardon him, or to order a full public inquiry into the case. The injustice of this to the gentleman himself must be obvious to everybody. It must be assumed à priori that the papers in the possession of the Home Office, whatever they may be, are wholly unfavourable to Mr. Edalji. What their nature may be nobody knows; what credit they are entitled to the committee now at work cannot possibly determine. All that these three gentlemen can do is to say whether or not the Home Office was justified in arriving at the decisions it has arrived at on these documents. If, as seems most probable, they decide that it was, the Home Office, which ought really to be on its trial in this matter, obtains a thin coat of whitewash without any real justification, and at the expense once more of the man who is seeking for justice. If, on the other hand, the papers are pronounced not to justify the action taken on them, justice can only be done by ordering a public inquiry into the whole case, the difficulties in the way of which have been so clearly stated by Sir Robert Romer. The proceeding is at once unjust and absurd, and it is difficult to see what good can come of it.

However, the result of it must be awaited before any further steps are taken. In the meantime a substantial sum of money has been collected through the agency of Truth and the Daily Telegraph for the assistance of Mr. Edalji at the inquiry which was supposed to have been promised. Sir Conan Doyle, who has taken the lead in this matter, is unfortunately laid up at this juncture; but I hear from him that he thinks, as I do, that the money should be retained pending further developments, and I hope that the subscribers will consent to this course for the present. The examination of the papers in the possession of the Home Office cannot in the ordinary course of things take many days, and when the result is announced, what is best to be done next on Mr. Edalji's behalf can very soon be decided.

BOWDEN GREEN AND STREET NOISES.

Mr. Thomas Bowden Green, who has so long been under notice in these columns in connection with philanthropic or quasi-philanthropic enterprises of a more or less shady description, has just issued a financial statement of the latest of these concerns, styled "The Betterment of London Association, with which is incorporated the Street Noises Abatement Committee." The operations of this association in reference to street noises have attracted some public notice, and many excellent people are much interested in its doings. I am not concerned to deny that, properly conducted, such an association might be a useful body, deserving of support. All I am concerned about is to warn those interested in the object in view that Bowden Green's association is not properly conducted, and is thoroughly undeserving of support. Many reasons for that opinion have been given from time to time in Truth. They are in all respects confirmed by the financial statement above mentioned, as I will now proceed to show.

This statement purports to account for receipts to the amount of £2,462 5s. In a properly conducted association supported by public subscriptions, accounts in respect of so large a sum would be issued by the honorary treasurer and vouched for by the certificate of a chartered accountant. This account bears at the foot the following note:—

> We have examined the above accounts with the books and vouchers of the Association, and find the same to be correct.
> Henry Mogridge. Thos. Bowden Green, F.R.C.A.,
> Arthur MacGillicuddy. Hon. Sec.

No information is given as to who Henry Mogridge and Arthur MacGillicuddy may be, what qualifications they possess for the function they have discharged, nor who authorised them to examine and sign the association's accounts. The inference is that this is an account prepared by Green and countersigned by two friends or assistants. We thus start with ocular demonstration that in the vitally important matter of preparing and issuing its accounts to the subscribers, the association is not a properly conducted one.

The receipts which Mr. Green feels himself called upon to account for are thus stated:—

To balance in hand from last audit	£15 15 6
To subscriptions and donations during 2½ years (1st July, 1904, to 31st December, 1906)	1,446 8 6
To amounts advanced for the development of the movement during its early years (for repayments see "Expenditure" column)	1,000 0 0

Subscriptions, it will be seen, have been coming in for 2½ years at the average rate of nearly £600 a year, but no audit has been held or accounts issued since July, 1904—neither does it appear that any proper audit has been held now. Moreover, this is the normal course of business. The last account issued, which was dealt with in Truth in December, 1904, covered the period from January 1, 1902, to June 30, 1904. Two and a half years is evidently, in Bowden Green's opinion, a proper period for the making up of the books of a public institution, and the issue of accounts to the subscribers. I call attention, also, to the item of £1,000 "advanced for the development of the movement during its early years." Advanced by whom, and when? The whole sum has been "advanced," if it has been advanced at all, during the period covered by the account. For the previous period of 2½ years, Green entered in the same way a sum of £50 as "advanced by friends." The description of the more recent advances as "for the development of the movement during its early years" is most misleading, for it suggests that the entry relates to a period prior to this account. In the 1904 account Green acknowledged receipts to the amount of £1,322. By that time, therefore, the movement was being well supported; and there is no visible reason why he should have had to borrow £1,000 during the last 2½ years. The importance of this entry is seen when one finds in the "expenditure column" an entry of £250 as "repayment of advances for the development of the movement during its early years." Repaid to whom? I will say a word more on that question presently.

Let us look now at the manner in which the alleged receipts of £2,462 5s. are alleged to have been spent. Here are the items:—

I frankly confess that this account takes my breath away. A good many curiosities of philanthropic finance have come before me in my time, but nothing equal to this. Here we have a concern which, in the course of two and a half years, has fixed up a few enamelled iron plates in London (number, you observe, carefully omitted), has presented petitions to five specified authorities, and perhaps one or two more, and has distributed a certain amount of literature (chiefly for advertising purposes); and to accomplish these microscopic results has cost, after deducting the balance in hand and the alleged repayment of loans and interest, upwards of £2,200! To collect £1,446 in subscriptions and donations costs, in commissions alone, £216, or 15 per cent., independently of the salaries of the staff, and the expenditure on advertising, postage, literature, and travelling expenses. The salaries and the up-keep of two offices—what in the name of wonder are two offices required for?—absorb £941, only about £500 less than the total income from the public. Yet in spite of all this expenditure on staff and apparatus, it costs a further £223 to get up about half-a-dozen petitions to public authorities. It would be wasting time and space to criticise the items in further detail. The figures speak for themselves, and if any subscriber cannot understand them at a glance, I doubt if anything I can say will enlighten him.

The matter which I am chiefly concerned with is Bowden Green's share of this monstrous expenditure. He poses as an "honorary" secretary, and the account discloses no money paid to him except an unspecified amount for "expenses." The intention, therefore, is to suggest that he is doing the work of the Association, such as it is, for love. I do not believe this, and no one will believe it who knows the man's record as a charity-monger. Where, then, does Bowden Green come in? Probably under many heads, but I should look for him chiefly under three. (1) It has already been explained that when he started this Betterment of London Association, he also floated a company called the Betterment of London Printing and Publishing Company, Ltd. This company was to print and publish the Betterment of London Journal, which the Association was to issue, and apparently to do the printing of the Association generally. The Betterment of London Journal has apparently become the "Occasional Papers" mentioned in the account; but if the original arrangement is still in existence, Green will have made a profit of unknown amount out of the expenditure of £402 for publishing work. (2) There is another item of unstated amount for "hon. sec.'s expenses," which are lumped in with the "remuneration of secretaries and inspectors" and office assistants' expenses. In the 1904 account, though then, as now, "honorary" secretary, Green put himself down for an "honorarium" to the tune of £262 10s. as "editor." The editor's honorarium has disappeared from the present account; but on the other hand it appears that the salaries of the staff, with the assistance of the new item, "hon. sec.'s expenses," have risen from £286 13s. to £549 13s. 6d., an increase of £263. It will be seen that this corresponds within 10s. to the "editor's honorarium" in the previous account; and I suggest to the subscribers that they should inquire whether the "honorary" secretary has not charged this amount as his "expenses," or, if not, how the salaries and expenses of the staff have increased in 2½ years by this enormous amount. (3) £250 is entered as repayment of advances. As already shown, the circumstances of the advances are misrepresented, the money, if borrowed at all, having been borrowed within the period covered by this account. No information is given as to the reason for borrowing money within that time, or from whom it was borrowed and to whom repaid. It is one of the commonest practices of charity-mongers who issue uncertified accounts to create debts in their own favour and repay themselves out of the subscriptions as opportunity offers. Is it possible that Mr. Green is the generous friend who received this £250 in repayment of his advances to the infant "movement"? If so, Mr. Green being by no means a millionaire, the subscribers ought to know, and should make it their business to know, the dates, amounts, and reasons for his alleged loans.

There is, however, another possible explanation of the advances and repayments, and it is suggested by the entry of £82 16s. 6d. for "interest on deposits." In connection with the Thrift Society, Green carried on for years an abominable system of appointing assistant secretaries in his office on payment of a returnable premium or deposit. Many unfortunate persons of both sexes, on giving up the work after becoming acquainted with the real character of the concern, had the greatest difficulty in recovering the money thus paid. Some never did so at all; and those who were paid were—certainly in some cases and probably in all—only paid at the expense of the fresh victims who succeeded them. When dealing with the Betterment of London finances in 1904, I mentioned that Green was trying this trick again, and that a gentleman who had applied for the post of a secretary at the branch office had been asked to deposit no less than £500, at 5 per cent. interest. I have heard that large deposits have since been obtained in this way, and the entry of £82 16s. 6d. for "interest on deposits" confirms this information. The question, therefore, arises whether the £1,000 advance on the other side of the account may not refer to such deposits by persons on the office staff. In that case the advance is in a sense a genuine entry, and possibly the repayment is too; but the description of "amounts advanced for the development of the movement during its early years" then becomes more delusive than ever; and the entry in this shape can only be designed to conceal from the subscribers the traffic in appointments which Green is carrying on. If such a system is being practised, it is utterly disreputable. It cannot be necessary, even if it were justifiable, to carry on the work of the association by such means, for the society is under no obligation to spend more money than it can obtain from subscriptions; nor is it likely that any secretary who was really "honorary" and had no financial interest in the concern would resort to such a method of raising money.

My reason for going into this account at some length is that I have lately been in communication with gentlemen interested in the anti-street-noises movement who are concerned about the discredit which it suffers from the criticism of the Betterment of London Association in Truth. It has been suggested to me that I should bury Bowden Green's past out of regard for the commendable objects of the B.L.A., or that I should explain how my objections to the individual may be met, or suggest some sort of modus vivendi. The answer to all this is to be found above. I would bury Bowden Green's past with pleasure if he himself would make it possible. We have all heard of men "rising on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things;" and I should be the last to disturb the dead self for the purpose of throwing down one who has risen by this process. But T. B. G. shows no disposition to rise in this way; on the contrary, he is ever demonstrating that the T. B. G. of the past, so far from being dead, is very much alive and kicking. A few years ago I went, at great expenditure of time and trouble, and at Green's own invitation, into the affairs of the National Thrift Society. In passing, I may remark that though it suits him now to represent himself, especially to hesitating subscribers, as pursued with implacable malignity by somebody connected with Truth, not a word as to the results of that investigation was told in this paper at the time. It is now clear that his misconduct ought to have been exposed in the public interest; but he was let off, and had every opportunity of profiting by the lesson he received. It was only when I found him long afterwards at his old game that my experience of the Thrift Society was published. He has the least possible right, therefore, to complain now of the way he has been treated by Truth. So far as can be judged from his own published information, he is now repeating the history of the Thrift Society in every detail, and no reason can be seriously suggested why those on whom he is practising should not be warned of what he has done before and what he is apparently doing again. On the contrary, it appears to me to be the first duty of one who knows the man to prevent, as far as possible, those who do not from being imposed upon by him. Personally, I have a good deal of sympathy with those inhabitants of London who find their lives made intolerable by Italian organs, German bands, newspaper boys, motor 'buses, or any of the nuisances which T. B. G. sums up under the picturesque title of the Noise Fiend. But it is quite certain that T. B. G. could not dispose of the Fiend if he would; nor is it very likely that he would if he could, so long as the Fiend is worth a few hundreds a year to him in a state of freedom. It is absurd to suppose that such an organisation as the Betterment of London Association can ever practically influence either those who make the laws or those who administer them. The only advice, therefore, that I can give to those who are sufficiently keen on this "movement" to put their money into it, is that they should first dissociate themselves from Bowden Green, and then associate themselves in a properly constituted body, controlling it themselves, and appointing officials whom they can trust to do their work properly and to be content with the salaries paid them.

A PEER AMONG THE PRESSMEN.

[I have received the following from the noble lord who has been favouring me lately with studies in journalism.—Ed. Truth.]

I was awfully pleased when I read my article on the County Council election last week, it seemed to me to go so uncommonly well, though I notice I put my money on the wrong horse, as far as picking the winner goes. Not that I have much reason to complain myself, for my brother-in-law—the one who runs the electrical companies, I mean—was so delighted with the result that he gave my sister Kate a blank cheque to get herself a new set of sables, and some of it came in uncommonly useful. But about my article. I was surprised to find that Jessie was a bit worried about it. She liked it tremendously at first, but she happened to look at it again in her dressing-room while she was waiting for her "call," and it suddenly struck her that it was quite different from the rest of the paper. She thought it was ever so much better herself, but she was afraid that it might not be quite professional enough. She talked it over with her press-agent next morning—he had come to discuss with her whether she did not think it was almost time she had her emeralds stolen again, or some technical matter like that—not, of course, mentioning my name, for nobody has tumbled to the fact of my writing yet, but in a sort of general way. She gathered from him that the best way to make a name for yourself as a journalist is to get a particular style of writing of your own and stick to it. It did not matter a bit whether it was good or bad, he told her, so long as there was no mistaking it. And the best things to write about were things that everybody knew all about already, so that they would not have their attention taken away from your style, and how very clever you must be to write about it so differently to anything they could have done. He promised to send her two or three examples of the sort of thing he meant, and as soon as she got them she handed them over to me, and told me she thought I had better get them up a bit. Of course, I knew she was right; a girl cannot get on in the way she has done without having her head screwed on tight, especially if she is as lovely as Jessie is. If you could only see her eyes!—they are the most beautiful brown colour, and bright, like brown diamonds, if there were such things—and there is a sort of tenderness in them, too.

But about those newspaper articles. I very soon saw that it was no good my trying to turn out anything original of the kind on my own account—not without years of practice—and the best thing I could do would be to try to get as near one of them as possible. We went through them all very carefully, and there were two of them that seemed likely to suit me. One was by a Mr. James Douglas. It was in the Morning Leader, and it was about billiards. I liked this because billiards is a game I know something about. Jessie preferred one by a Mr. Bartholomew Kennedy. It was in the Daily Mail, and it was about America. I could not make head or tail of most of it myself, but Jessie said it would be easy for me to imitate, because the style was so marked. In the end we settled that I had better try my hand at both styles, and you could decide which you like best, and I would keep to that in future. I thought I would make my article about motor 'buses, because every one is interested in them—my brother-in-law in particular. Perhaps when you have read them both you would not mind letting me know which you prefer. The first is in my Douglas style.

1. The Ineffability of the Motor-'Bus.

Yesterday, being unnerved by the complexity of civilisation, I wandered down to Charing Cross. Cabs and vans and motor 'buses were drifting up and down Whitehall and melting into the Strand and Cockspur-street. The motor 'buses stirred my curiosity. They must have come from somewhere and be going somewhere else. Some of them went very fast, others more slowly; some would not move at all, some proceeded sideways. Suddenly it flashed upon me that I had chanced upon the explanation of their mystery. By some accident I had floated into the vortex of the motor maëlstrom. I settled myself firmly upon the curbstone and wept over the unchanging change of Charing Cross. It is the cross of complications. Around it are always all manner of confusions. Here, unexpectedly, upon an unchallengeable curbstone, Charing Cross provides me with the luxurious spectacle of inexpressible skilfulness in the most subtly exquisite sport the worlds have ever seen. The audience is superb. There are continual crowds. Motor-'bus driving is an artistic pursuit. It is not a common trade. It is a religion, an all-engrossing act of worship, rather than a means of livelihood. It is the recreation of men of action.

The roadway is wide. Many lines of traffic converge and mingle within it. There are cab-drivers, and butcher-boys on bicycles. Above all, there are the motor-'bus drivers. A visitor from Colney Hatch might imagine that these men, with their grimed fingers and veiled eyes, were Druids, celebrating the Eleusinian mysteries, charged with horrid occultations. He might conceive the muffled wailing of the horns as the anguished appeals of hidden victims, suffocating amid sacrificial pyres. The varied colours of the vehicles he might conceive as solemnly symbolical. His blood would freeze beneath the horror of their suggestion. He would glower terror-stricken at the unmanageable machines, weaving a labyrinthine weft, mingling inebriated curves and skiddings. The red "Generals" he might understand as symbolising the horrid purpose of the Druids; the white "Vanguards" he might conceive to be the emblems of the victims' bleaching bones; the black "Tillings" the horrid smoke rising from the altars. The voices of the conductors would seem to him the dreadful howlings of the Furies. "Benk! Benk! Victorier! Cherring Cross!" would fill him with forebodings of the decreasing durance of distance and the inexorable limitations of penny fares.

London fades before me like a bioscope-picture as I watch the driver making melody with his clutches. To me he seems the poet of the unutterably unexpected. He is ——

Perhaps I have done enough to show you what I can do in this style. Here is the other, which is as near as I can make it to Mr. Kennedy's. I found it a good deal easier to write, because I did not have to worry about verbs and things:—

2. The Motor-'Bus Driver.

The motor-'bus driver will give way to nobody. He would not give way to a brewer's lorry. He would not give way to a traction engine. He would scarcely give way to a railway train. The motor-'bus driver. It is a fine thing to be a motor-'bus driver. You can kill men. You can kill women. You can even, if you are lucky, run over a policeman. You will acquire certain qualities—calmness, virtue, pride.

Your empire will reach from one curb-stone to the other. You will overturn hansoms. You will overturn lamp-posts. Even pillar-boxes. And houses. Resistless. Sweeping. Skidding. The motor-'bus driver.

You will sit on the front seat and direct.

Your fingers will let loose the power of petrol upon living men. Death, evil odours, and broken limbs they will deal out. By the dozen. Indiscriminate. Streets, squares, circuses they will govern. And other places whose names I have forgotten.

Forgotten.

You will look coldly before you. You will be calm. Strong. Nervy. You will travel above the speed limit. Forward. Sideways. Backwards. Or all at once. Behind your deeds will be a god. The god of petrol. Men will get out of your way. If they have time. The motor-'bus driver.

Sad and black is the lot of the pedestrian who seeks to cross the road. Sad and black. He has no friends. Hit him. Hard. The tremendous power that harnesses the earth-forces is not his friend. Sinister mystery. Conundrum ineffaceable. Enduring, immovable incomprehensibility.

Since the coming of the motor-'bus, what is this Strand? It is a wide street. Still. An old street. A strange street. A street. But the joy, the freshness of the old days is gone. The curse of the motor-'bus is over it. Its atmosphere is oily, discoloured, niffy. Poisonous smoke soddens it. Columns of it. Huge. Long. Death dealing. The rays of the sun cannot struggle through it. It smells so vile that the cab-horses shy on their ranks. The street is as a Hell. An Inferno. The very cats shun it. But thousands must endure it. The people who walk.

All down the street they walk. Nearly all of them wear boots. Leather boots.

Lord!

I am not really quite sure, myself, which style I am best at. But if you will let me know which you prefer I will always keep to it. I am not sending you this to publish, unless you think it would sell the paper—Jessie, by the way, likes them both no end. I would have tried to send you a really topical article, but I rather overdid it getting up the County Council facts last week, and I have had headaches ever since. While I think of it, I do not quite know what your usual custom is, but I have not heard from your cashier yet about the last two articles. I was wondering, if I was to call at your office some time during the week, if he would mind advancing me something on account. Since I have become a journalist, I seem to have quite lost my luck at Bridge somehow.

THE THEATRES.

"My Darling," at Hicks'.

Mr. Hicks and Mr. Haines between them have written the above musical play, which was produced last Saturday evening at the Hicks Theatre. I wish I could add that Mr. Hicks is playing in it, but by this time he is far away, astonishing the provinces with "The Beauty of Bath." On the last London night of that play he announced that "My Darling" would be exactly like its predecessor. There is much to be said in support of that argument, from one point of view, though there are ingredients missing. There is, for instance, the ghost or spirit of Mr. Hicks, which shows itself, sometimes to advantage, in the quips of the dialogue. But these would need the presence on the stage in flesh and blood of their author before they could obtain sufficient body to fill the whole field of vision. Mr. Henry Lytton is very active as the young buck who sings Romeo in place of his friend the tenor, incapacitated for that evening through champagne. "Champagnitis" is a joke word typical of Mr. Hicks, but he is needed to give the full sparkle to the suggestion; otherwise, in his own words, the Jack Hylton is apt to be "egged off."

The muddle of masks and dominoes, people expecting to meet their beloved and clasping their best detested at the Hôtel d'Ontelle, is familiar to farce, and treated here in the familiar way. The accessories may be at once set down as gorgeous, and with them may be coupled the robes of the ladies—Butterflies they are that once were Buns—who follow the adventures of the evening. An innovation is the introduction of genuine Scots pipes and pipers, who achieve their music well and solemnly in the midst of flowered silks and satins rather surprised at the martial sounds. But shadows, shadows, I see on the programme and in memory, until my eye stops at the welcome name of Marie Studholme, who is not a shadow, though not stout, as she points out. This little lady made friends with the audience at once, as is her custom, and then had a very fair luncheon with Mr. Hylton (H. A. Lytton) before lapsing into dainty song. At a later period, for some obscure reason, a pathetic scene is introduced between Miss Beryl Faber, as the hard, yet to-be-melted demi-mondaine, and Miss Marie. Miss Faber had no difficulty in dealing with the situation, ayant vu bien d'autres, and for Miss Studholme it may be said that she took the fence gallantly, though not in her stride. I hope some day to welcome her in real comedy. Ghosts, ghosts come to memory, with the clever but quite unexplained imitations of popular players in the second act, with Mr. Kalisz's tenor, so obviously aped from Maurice Farkoa. Even Master Valchera, of Vaudeville renown, has his shadow in a little boy with a Scottish accent and the gift of the gab. Shadow, too, is the Hotel Proprietor, "Oddy," of Mr. Tom Graves, with whom, on the first night, it was possible to compare reality in the stalls. Why does Mr. McArdle not make me feel as amused as I could wish with the adventures of the Newspaper Proprietor? I cannot tell. Why does Miss Barbara Deane suddenly sing "Home Sweet Home," in the last act? I really forget, unless she intended to take off Patti; but she must not be disconcerted to tears by the foolish disapproval of a few, for she has a good voice. Lastly, why do all these disconnected things happen? I have forgotten enough Latin to make a pun that explains all: Post Hicks: ergo propter Hicks. That is bad Latin, but, "My Darling," it is all you deserve.

At the Alhambra the past week has witnessed a new ballet, coming on about ten o'clock. "L'Amour" still seems to maintain its hold of public sympathy. "Queen of Spades" is the name of the new fantasy, and in it figures the graceful and athletic Mlle. Alexia. Eccentric in her orbit, Mlle. Alexia claims attention by dint of this very eccentricity, which makes comparison with more normal stars of the toe vain. There is a good deal of action in this ballet, and with the help of the synoptical programme, the spectator may follow, if he will, the love and frenzy of the young sculptor, who, for love of L'Etoile, loses his all at cards in the Kursaal. He may follow him even on his dreams, which comprise the second scene, and with the aid of the biograph, manifest, amid much else, his thoughts of deadly vengeance upon his rival. Individual tastes vary; mine, I fear, go against the use of semblance where one might have reality. The scenes of the dream would have been more vivid if acted behind gauze, or some device similar to that adopted some years ago, when Maeterlinck's "Pelléas and Mélisande" was acted at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. The ballet will be found cheerful of ending by that single spectator in a hundred who cares about the story. The majority will be more interested to study the variations on the theme: playing cards, roulette and bridge as reflected in the costume and dances of this new work. The detail of revolving roulette boards and cards surmounting them displayed by the chorus was one that amused me. Admittedly the ballet has caused the expenditure of much money and trouble, and although I have known ballets that have gone with greater gusto in this famous house, many of my readers will doubtless go to learn how to play roulette picturesquely, and to mix liqueurs according to the recipe of Signor Alfredo Curti.

"The Prodigal Son" is again earning money for his father. The Adelphi Theatre was crowded on Monday of last week, the first of the revival. Mr. Frank Cooper, as on former occasions, is a favourite with the special audience that evidently intends to prove that the Adelphi has not been deserted by the descendants of those that made it famous for melodrama. Certain of the picturesque accessories, such as the sheep and the carnival, have now no longer their place in this great work; Mr. Alexander has long been gone; Mrs. John Wood and Miss Nancy Price are now no more visible. But their successors hold the audience with a grip as tenacious, to judge by the commendation of their doings vociferated from many parts of the house.

* * * * *

Let me say in one word what it would take two columns to say in full. The performance of Mr. "You Never Can Tell" at the Court Theatre is worthy of an early visit. I was there with a party not especially favourable to that author, on an evening of last week, and all admitted that they had not been so well entertained at any party on or off the stage for many a week. The play is very amusing and not at all "unpleasant." Mr. Calvert, Miss Minto, Mr. Granville Barker—to name but three—and, more important than any individual, the whole cast, is at this moment ripe—like a strawberry in June.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE MONTAGNINI PAPERS.

THEY make a noise about the Montagnini papers both in Paris and in Rome. Who could doubt that the Vatican did not do its utmost to prevent King Alfonso coming to visit M. Loubet? Vatican interest prompted Monsignor Merry del Val to move in this direction. Nothing but Vatican interest ever moves a Papal Secretary of State; some clear, direct interest of this kind is always sure to move him. Were it not so, why send nuncios to every Catholic country, and political agents to the non-Catholic? The Vatican mind is essentially politic and diplomatic. The Curia cannot live on air. Its members are accustomed to costly splendour. "Love makes the world go round elsewhere," said Cardinal Antonelli to Mirès. "Money alone has influence here." Mirès had, therefore, to pay dearly for his concession of the Roman railways. Spain, though a poor country, furnishes handsome revenues to St. Peter's See. The latter would be inconsistent with itself and its past history had it not done all in its power to prevent Alfonso's projected visit. In European politics the Vatican has been leaning on the German Emperor's arm. He had rendered the Pope services. In return he wanted services of the Pope, better services perhaps. His Lutheran subjects had begun to growl at his Papal proclivities. They are his most intelligent subjects. He found that he could never hold the Catholics. As members of the Reichstag Centre they united with the Socialists against his pet schemes of naval aggrandisement and Welt-politik. Of course, as a means to this end he would have wanted to keep Alfonso from coming to Paris. Alfonso XII. belonged entirely to Bismarck. The Hohenlohe "Memoirs" tell us that he said to the Emperor William I., "My army is yours to command. If you ever go to war with France I will march at the head of my troops against her." "That is more than I want," quoth the sly old Emperor. "All I want is to be assured of your friendly neutrality." Now that a great navy lies at Kiel, and that vast mercantile steamers hoisting the German flag plough the ocean, the friendly neutrality of Spain is of more importance than ever to the Kaiser. Spain is a road by which the Germans could turn a strong French position. A large German force could land in safety in a Basque port, Passages or some other, and enter, as Wellington did, the Gascon end of France. To guard against this contingency France would have to keep nothing less than an army near the Bidassoa.

You see from this that, in endeavouring to stop the growing intimacy between Paris and Madrid, Monsignor Merry del Val served at once a Papal and a German interest. He is not to be blamed, inasmuch as he discharged a duty to the temporal power of the Pope, which now chiefly lies in Peter's pence. He apprised the Papal agent here of his efforts, so that he could discreetly, in private conversations, ventilate the matter without leaving any traces in archives.

The Norwegian explorer, Amundsen, has been the hero of a whole week. He came, lectured, received gold medals, the congratulations of the head of the State, and nearly made Paris forget what every one speaks of as "the abominable income-tax scheme." More than ever he has confirmed me in my belief that faith removes mountains, and that outside of engineering feats the greatest things are done by persons of scanty means. Just think of the heaps of gold that have been spent on fitting up Polar expeditions that nearly always failed. Amundsen's adventure, which lasted three years, only cost £8,000 throughout. It is true that Parry, Sir John Franklin, McClintock, McClure, and so on, knew nothing of tinned foods, of the warming qualities of sardines and anchovies preserved in oil, and of many other devices for cheating the temperature. They were prejudiced in favour of rum. Amundsen has been brought up under the healthy influence of the Gothenberg law.

Our Norwegian explorer pleased by his gentle manners, with much peeping through it that denoted a frank, firm, thoughtful character. It would be awfully hard to find in him the wherewithal for a stage hero. He can talk, but not fluently and eloquently. The manner in speaking struck those who went to his lecture as calm, unvarnished statement that might not have come to much had he not had the constant support of optical effects. But the deeply graven lines of the face spoke of intense and prolonged anxiety, of mental strain, tension, anguish, and withal something that told of a hopeful habit of mind with deep enthusiasm to maintain it. His well-set, clean-built figure, and easy motions won the favour of some sculptors who went to study his plastic points. It might do for a future statue or bas-relief of Jason, or of Ulysses, in a break in his long voyage. That is what Mercié thinks. The blue eyes of the explorer are those of a mild seer, and on the look-out, as it were, for some far-off haven or Princess Lontaine. There is no sign of an Esquimaux Calypso in his lectures.

Three years of the Polar regions ought to count for twenty of ordinary life. Amundsen has kept in perfect health. He lost but one of his six companions. I think of Drake's "Golden Hind," a poor little pinnace, as I mentally review the achievements of the Gjoa, a 42-ton barque which an angry whale might have tossed sky-high. It would have only needed collision with a very small iceberg to knock it to pieces. The calm courage of the leader and crew took it safe and sound through the mysterious passages and down the Pacific, and through the Golden Gate into the haven of California. "Haven" meant "heaven" to the explorer and his six men—namely, Godfried Hansen, Ristredt, Lund, Helmer Hansen, Lindstrom, and poor Wüg. Wüg's name is not euphonious. It rhymes to nothing heroic that I can think of. But the solitary, snow-capped mound under which he lies is invested with poetic interest.

Amundsen sees a serious, or a more than serious, drawback to his expedition. It has brought those simple, honest inhabitants of the Polar regions face to face with civilisation. This contact must upset all their traditional ideas, and distort their imaginations, fever the minds of their best men and women, and make the lot of many among them a torment. He did not say whether the adventure of Theseus and Ariadne was repeated in the course of his voyage, but he spoke in private of the inhabitants of his winter station as having, until he came among them, lived happily within the limits of their narrow means and small enlightenment. He found the women devoted, gentle, simple. Those who had babies not only gave sustenance to the infants, but to the goodmen of their snow-house. They did so in the most cheerful way, and happy to be of service. Those primitive people have complex grammars and social etiquettes. Their sense of smell is either defective, or takes a pleasure in odours which made the explorers hold their noses. To make use of a euphemism, they offer at their feasts the "inside" of the animal to the most honoured guests or members of the family. Hibernating through long winters—ten and a half months or more—they come to have a village dialect incomprehensible to villagers at a short distance from theirs. The village is a circle of snow houses internally communicating. The word miki in one village may mean a child, and in another a dog. Amundsen and his comrades thought 30 degrees below freezing point summer heat. They had had to put up with 60 degrees. The steam that went up in huts from animals and inhabitants fell down from the roof in frosty snow. The explorers, observing this effect, used it for a Turkish bath. Imagine!

"The North-West passage," says Amundsen, "can never be of any commercial use, nor of much practical use, except to facilitate the study of the Magnetic Pole." One would think he had had enough of the dismal Polar regions. Not at all; he is keen on further exploration. Not only his curiosity as a savant prompts him, but he wants again to see the boundless horizon of the low snow-fields, and the effects of the borealis lights, which are far finer than he could have imagined in somewhat lower latitudes. These snow plains are magnificent, especially in the short summers. Their thick mists in falling and in melting away are full of weird beauty. There is no such blue on earth as that of the Polar ice. The higher one goes, the finer the blue, but, of course, the eye of each person has its own visions of beauty. Amundsen can call to mind no colour combinations more delightful than along the North-West Passage. The wide difference between the Arctic and Antarctic Polar regions came home to him in his recent voyage. They are in the sharpest contrast. No human life or higher life than that of penguins and fishes is to be found in Antarctic countries. The Arctic circle has walruses, bears, dogs, reindeer, and human beings with some excellent human qualities. They have made the most of their conditions and are good people on the whole. Their conditions hold them in as the skin of the seal holds in that interesting animal. It will give our explorer real pleasure to see again his Polar friends.

Prince Robert de Broglie is hardly an interesting person. But this is not a reason why the Prefect of Police should prevent him and his wife displaying their musical talents at the Scala Music Hall. If his father pays roughs, or sets on young sprigs of nobility to get up riots, the police ought to drop down on them, and the Commissioner of Police send them on to "la Correctionelle." It seems that General Picquart can lay hold on the Prince as a defaulting reservist and send him to serve as a private soldier. Prince Robert has been threatened with this consequence of default should he return to France. He is a miserably poor soldier, health and energy being wanting. According to the canon law, he is still the husband of the Comtesse Fleury, née Deslandes and a semi-Oppenheim. The Pope has resisted all the attacks on him of the De Broglie family to obtain the annullation of this marriage. According to American law, Prince Robert is the husband of the lady he now goes about with. But he is not bound to her according to the French code, nor of course she to him. A Hermaut, a Downay, or a Chapus might find in this imbroglio some amusing situations. The slip-knot nature of their tie may not prevent it being lasting. "Rien n'est permanent que le provisoire." The Prince and Princess Robert expect lucrative engagements in Belgium, Bavaria, Switzerland, and Italy. They call her in his family circle la Tsigane. If the name has a basis of fact, she ought to be a born musician, but not exactly a type for the stilted De Broglie connection.

Police interference at the Moulin Rouge when the Marquise de Morny appeared there is cited by that connection as a reason why M. Lépine should put down a scandal at the Scala. Not so. What is there that out-Herods Herod in the joint artistic career of Prince and Princess Henri? One need not, in reference to that of the Marquise and Colette Willy, ask the same question. By the way, the Willy pair are now judicially separated. To avoid the washing of soiled linen in public, they did not ask for more. A separation automatically becomes a divorce at the end of three years, if in the meanwhile the séparés do not again set up en ménage together.

M. Abel Hermaut's comedy of "Les Jacobines" ought to bring him into the Academy. It is a satire on the Thermidorian ways of the upper Court ladies of this Republic. Why did he not call them "Les Radicales"? We associate Jacobinism with the guillotine en permanence, Robespierre, la patrie en danger, and the screaming and universal excitement of 1793. M. Hermaut is a drawing-room satirist only. His litre vessel will not contain any ocean, sea, or even good-sized pool. He writes this time against divorce, which he so amply justified—without, perhaps, meaning to do so—in "La Belle Madame Héber." His Jacobins, after treating marriage as a jest, deal with divorce in a similar spirit. They regard both as a means to legalise free love. He is not generally inclined to express his feelings with warmth. Germaine has thought him sluggish and sleepy, and altogether a lump of lead. But she gives her estimate in sparkling terms, and lavishes at his expense brilliant and cheeky chaff. This time, however, indignation heats him, and makes him eloquent. She finds she has misunderstood him. An appeal to her better feelings in terms of the enthroning of Plutus and Cytheris is successful. Divorce may, just like marriage, serve as a screw.

Let us see how it answers. Germaine, the premier rôle, has married a M. Drouart, and seems not to have had reason to regret it. We find, however, that she feels the matrimonial chain unbearable. Why? She thinks she might have done better by marrying her cousin Bernies. At any rate, he is now more to her liking. But as her husband is impeccable, and has no desire to help her to divorce him, she must create a noisily scandalous situation. What is it to be? Why, to elope with Bernies, with whom she has engaged in a sentimental passage of arms at the très chic country house where she receives a party of visitors. Bernies receives warning of her intention, and stops her. In real life we have had the divorced wife of an ex-Minister marrying a "secularised" Jesuit, her former spiritual director. To-morrow we may have a princess running away with her footman. Prince Hohenlohe might have recorded such an event, but somehow did not. Who could, with such scandals to talk about, pay the slightest attention to the break-up of a ménage Drouart?

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

ENGLAND, dear Lady Betty, is on the treadmill of a movement. It is not a party, politicians, agitators, or a class that are compelling us to move, but the treadmill of development in the United States, and to resist is only to incur unnecessary suffering.

Almost every small town in England is in advance of London; almost every small town in the Colonies is in advance of the small towns in England; and almost every small town in the United States is in advance of those in the Colonies. The centre of resistance is the West-End, with its artificial conditions, private interests, monopolies, and privileges, and the further from the influence of these, the less opposition there is to progress.

The West-End is being denounced by the preacher, philosopher, novelist, writer of plays, journalist, and the orderly throughout the Empire, who describe it as mostly composed of co-respondents and company promoters!

There is a companion picture to that: "The Animal Artisan," the dray-horse of human labour, with the bit in his mouth throughout the day, harnessed to the shafts, stalled at night in a slum-stable, with just sufficient fodder to sustain life, and when old or infirm, despatched to the "knacker's yard," the workhouse.

. . . . .

The "Wisdom of the West-End" has invariably proved to have been folly. Every movement in advance from time immemorial has been vigorously opposed by the West-End on the ground that each change must inevitably ruin the country—and with each successive alteration the nation has increased in prosperity and importance. In the "Reminiscences," "Journals," and "Letters" of almost every "upper-class" politician in this country for generations past occurs some such phrase as "The outlook is despairing; if this so-called 'reform' is adopted the ruin of Great Britain is assured"!

There is one comparatively trivial instance of West-End wisdom which may be described here, for the consequences of it are a striking example of retributive justice. When the railway was being introduced into England, the West-End refused to have stations established in the district, or even sufficiently close to it to possibly disquiet its members. Since then they, and their descendants, have suffered enormous inconvenience through being so far distant from the stations, and have spent millions collectively in being conveyed to them. Again, the West-End refused permission to run a tramway through the district, and, therefore, its streets have eventually become congested with omnibuses and noisy motor-omnibuses, whilst a railway has been built under Piccadilly!

Nevertheless, there will some day be a central station, and lines of tramways will cross Mayfair, joining North London to the South and the West to the East. Every delay of progress has to be paid for with compound interest.

* * * * *

There is no such imaginative a people as the English; they always foresee evil in the future, and believe the past to have been filled with good. How they must have suffered in the past to have so great a dread of the future!

* * * * *

It is always being told to us how much woman in England has gained from man in recent times, how greatly her liberty of action has been increased, how much more influence she exercises, and how considerably her general condition has improved. It appears to be imagined that man has submitted to all that change without receiving adequate compensation. The restraints which hampered him in his association with woman have been enormously relaxed in recent years; she permits him to saturate her with smoke, to treat her with a disrespect which her predecessors would never have tolerated, to discuss subjects before her which his predecessors would have feared even to approach, and to regard her as a secondary circumstance in life—the first being the acquisition of money. In the exchange it is not at all certain that woman has not been the loser.

Times have changed, and with them the correctness of many proverbs. "Look after the pence, the pounds will look after themselves," was a wise saying when we could move less freely, and opportunities were fewer than they are. Now, whilst we look after the pence we are losing the pounds.

The automatic musical conductor is the latest innovation, and it is easy to predict that the days of the energetic white-gloved man who intercepts the view of part of the audience at every theatre are numbered. It has been discovered that an instrument can be easily constructed which will record every movement of the conductor's wand, and will afterwards cause a baton to perform exactly the same beats, and with the same intensity. When a conductor has trained his orchestra, a wire is attached to his wrist which connects it with the recording instrument; after that final performance the machine will guide a baton, making it repeat exactly the movements.

Mr. Charles Bulpett is known to many, and it will interest them to learn that he has written an account of his late exploring trip in Central Africa, "A Picnic Party in Wildest Africa," which has been published this week by Edward Arnold. In company with Mr. and Mrs. McMillan, the popular Americans, and a little army of servants and natives, Mr. Bulpett penetrated into portions of Africa which had never been reached before by the white man. Notwithstanding all that money could provide, and knowledge and intelligence could prepare, to remove the difficulties, dangers, and discomforts of such an adventurous expedition, this "picnic" had many of each to encounter, and the story of the journey is full of incident and information, described pleasantly and interestingly.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE annual financial meeting of the Jockey Club is to be held at Newmarket on Wednesday, April 17, being Wednesday in the Craven Week. Colonel Baird will then vacate the office of Steward on the completion of his three years' term of duty, and he will be succeeded as senior Steward by Lord Downe, who was specially elected last year to fill the vacancy caused by the deeply regretted death of Sir James Miller. It has been suggested that Lord Durham may be invited to take office again, and this is the best arrangement which could be made if only he is willing to accept the post. It is unfortunate for the Turf that the Duke of Richmond and Gordon is not disposed to resume the office of Steward, which (as Lord March) he filled with such thorough efficiency. Sir Daniel Cooper would make an excellent Steward, and it would be a considerable advantage that he constantly resides at Newmarket.

One frequently comes across lachrymose croakings over the alleged poverty of the Jockey Club. It seems to me that the Club must be now in the enjoyment of ample means, in spite of idiotic muddling and mismanagement in the past. The Stewards are ever on the alert to discover new sources of revenue, and they have been most fertile and ingenious in hitting upon devices for increasing their income. Within the last few years they have themselves published the Newmarket race-cards. Formerly the official card was a perquisite of the clerk of the course, who shared the profits with the local printer who was employed. The Racing Calendar has been taken away in the same manner from Messrs. Weatherby, and is now the property of the Jockey Club. Every meeting and every stake must be several times advertised in the Calendar, and the official charge is high for such advertisements. During the last few weeks the Stewards have gone a step further, and the Calendar now displays the advertisements of hotels, of horse medicines, and of many descriptions of tradesmen. Every imaginable transaction on the Turf now involves a fee, from owners, trainers, and employers, generally, to the Jockey Club, and a charge of seven guineas per annum is made for every horse trained at Newmarket. It is a great pity that the Stewards do not devote themselves to the business of revising the Newmarket programmes. The conditions of many of the races there are hopelessly obsolete, and in most of them the pecuniary inducements offered to owners are by no means generous. The stakes could be made very much more attractive without the change involving any additional charge on the fund. The principal summer race for two-year-olds at Newmarket is the July Stakes, which consists of a sweepstakes of £50 each, £30 forfeit, not a farthing being even nominally added. There are no penalties for previous winners, so the event is usually a certainty for some horse which has won at Epsom or at Ascot, and it excites no interest whatever. The Middle Park Plate, which was once known as "the two-year-old Derby," and which in its palmy days was the great event of the autumn at Newmarket, involves a liability of £25 for each entry, and the paltry sum which is advertised to be added is got back by means of entrances. Surely the Jockey Club could well afford to endow this race with £1,000 at least of added money really given, and not delivered with one hand and then taken back with the other. When this race was founded by the late Mr. Blenkiron, more than forty years ago, he gave £1,000 of added money, but when the Jockey Club took over the stake not long afterwards the endowment was reduced to £500, and since the dodge of a £5 entrance has been adopted the added money has usually been recovered from the subscribers. The conditions of the Dewhurst Plate also require that "amending hand" which Lord Coke prayed might be "blessed," and the name of this race ought long ago to have been altered.

All Black has been supported for the Derby at 100 to 7, which seems a preposterously short price, considering that he has never yet won a race. All Black has not been seen in public since the Sandown Park July Meeting, when he ran Traquair to a head for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes, but Lord Rosebery's colt was giving 9 lb., and All Black had two days previously been beaten at Newmarket for the Khedive Plate, for which race he started favourite, and the animals which finished in front of him were not within measurable distance of high-class form. It seems to me that 33 to 1 would be a more reasonable price to take about a colt with such moderate antecedents, but backers now appear to become perfectly infatuated and muddy-minded when they begin to meddle with the Derby. All Black is believed to have "come on" very considerably, as was mentioned in Truth some weeks ago. He is engaged in the Two Thousand. I am told that Traquair looks well, and he will no doubt be hard to beat over five and six furlongs, but he has not the most remote prospect of winning any of the great races of the year, and I do not suppose he will be trained for long-distance events. The race for the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot will no doubt find Traquair to the fore. If Lord Rosebery is to carry off the Two Thousand or Derby it is Bezonian which will be the winner, but I shall be surprised if this colt proves capable of securing either of these events.

At one time the Grand Military Gold Cup was really a great sporting race. In those days it was run over some steeplechase course which fairly represented a good hunting country, and there were a large number of starters. The cup was then a genuine affair, and any man owning a bona fide hunter of high class had a reasonable chance of winning the race. Of late years, however, the Grand Military Gold Cup has frequently brought out costly steeplechasers, instead of the hunters for which the race was established. It was never contemplated that such an event would attract horses worth thousands of pounds, and trained steeplechasers ought to be absolutely excluded from it. There are plenty of valuable races for such animals from the Grand National downwards, and they are altogether out of place in what was practically an amateur race when it was established. It is no wonder that the Grand Military Gold Cup has declined in importance, and that the event now excites no sporting interest whatever. Whereas there were once forty starters, there were this year only sixteen entries. Old Fairyhouse won several steeplechases in Ireland last year, and he was afterwards purchased for a large sum by Mr. Bewicke with the express object (it is said) of winning this race. Such a horse ought not to be eligible for an event of this description, and he is not "military" in any sense of the word, beyond the fact that he is owned by an officer, who would not be likely to ride such an animal in the hunting field. Shooting Star II. is another of the same class. Last year he won a great number of races, and when beaten he finished second to Ranunculus, who is a really good horse across country. What chance can any hunter stand against such animals as these? The Grand Military Gold Cup was a really important event in its class when it was contested by the sort of horses for which it was intended, and in those days the value of the race was just one-fifth of its present worth. It is a perfect bathos to find the entry for such an event containing the names of noted steeplechasers and of animals which have been running at the ordinary winter meetings.

It is said that Achilles will "go for" the Liverpool Spring Cup, and he is reported to have done well during the winter. Achilles created a rare sensation at the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting last year by defeating Bachelor's Button for the Burwell Plate, odds of 6 to 1 being laid on Mr. Joel's horse, who, however, was not so fit as he was at Ascot a few weeks later, and he laboured under the great disadvantage of having to make his own running. The victory of Achilles was an arrant fluke, and he afterwards started seven times without winning. I do not believe that he will be able to beat Bridge of Canny (who gives him 4 lb.) at Liverpool, if Lord Derby's horse is all right and fit to run.

It is probable that the fields for the two-year-old stakes and for most of the minor events at Lincoln and Liverpool will be exceedingly small, as very few horses indeed can possibly be fit for racing by the week after next. The early running of the season will probably turn out to be altogether unreliable. Horses will win through superior condition, which a month or two afterwards will be easily beaten by animals which finished behind them at the early meetings when backward.

Large house parties will be entertained during the week after next for the Liverpool Spring Races at Aintree by Lord and Lady Derby at Knowsley Park, and by Lord and Lady Sefton at Croxteth Hall, and it is understood that the Duke and Duchess of Westminster will have a few guests at Eaton Hall. It has been rumoured that the Prince of Wales will be at Aintree on Friday, the 22nd, to witness the race for the Grand National Steeplechase, in which case H.R.H. will presumably stay at Knowsley, where the King has several times been a guest during the spring race week.

The great event of the Kempton Park Meeting was the resurrection of Drumcree, who won the Grand National Steeplechase four years ago, after which he went all to pieces. Drumcree, however, recovered in the course of time, thanks to the skill and patience of those who had the management of him, and last year he was able to start for the Grand National, and he got over the country without a mistake, and altogether performed most creditably, all things considered. After running at Aintree Drumcree had not been seen in public until last week, when he was easily defeated by Rassendyl for the Stand Steeplechase, the winner having 10 lb. the best of the weights. Drumcree looked remarkably well, but he will be all the better for a few more gallops. This horse is to be ridden in the Grand National by Mr. Bulteel. He is a grand fencer, but decidedly deficient in speed. He is now thirteen years old.

Some dreadful crack-brained nonsense has been printed about the entry of Nulli Secundus in the Auteuil Hurdle Race, and one or two writers appear to have become quite hysterical at the idea of the King's colours being successful in an important French race. This gibberish has not appeared in any sporting paper, for, of course, any one with a particle of knowledge concerning public form must be aware that the odds against a horse of the class of Nulli Secundus for such a race as this are simply incalculable. Nulli Secundus has presumably been engaged merely as a compliment to the Société des Steeplechases de France, and it is in the greatest degree improbable that there is any idea of starting him at Auteuil, as he could not have a 1,000 to 1 chance, running at weight-for-age against the best form of the day. Roseate Dawn will no doubt "go for" the Auteuil race, and I expect he will defeat all the English lot.

It has lately been announced that Sagamore "is not engaged in any of the great three-year-old races." An ingenious writer, whose discourse is obviously not based on any knowledge whatever of the subject, points to Mr. Raphael's colt as an example of the blunders so often made by owners in entering their yearlings, as the animals of which great things are then expected are heavily engaged, but frequently prove worthless for high-class racing, while others, which did not promise so well, at first, are therefore omitted from the great races, but turn out to be fliers a year or two later. This is all true enough, but the selection of Sagamore as an instance of such an error is singularly unfortunate. Sagamore was entered as a yearling for all the classic races of this season, but his engagements became void through the death of his breeder, Sir James Miller. The fact is that if Sir James had lived, Sagamore would now be first favourite for the Derby, for I have no doubt but that this colt's performances of last season would have justified his being regarded as the best two-year-old of 1906.

Backers who support Slieve Gallion for the Derby at 7 to 2, three months before the race is run, must surely be insane. Even supposing Slieve Gallion to have won the Two Thousand, I do not believe that his price at Epsom would be much shorter, and it would surely be very much better business to take 2 to 1 on June 5 than 7 to 2 during the last week of February. There are some good judges who are of the opinion that Slieve Gallion will show to more advantage over the Derby course than over the R.M., and if he were beaten at Newmarket he would, of course, be knocked out to comparatively long odds. It must be remembered that the Newmarket Craven Meeting may discover a most formidable opponent to the public lot in Lord Falmouth's St. Martin. I have never attached the slightest importance to Slieve Gallion's defeat in the Middle Park Plate, as he had been seriously amiss. This colt's form at Ascot and at Doncaster was excellent, and my opinion is that if he had been in the same condition at Newmarket as he was when he won the New Stakes and the Champagne Stakes, he would have cantered away with the Middle Park Plate. It is curious how often the Ascot two-year-old form collapses after it has thrown people into paroxysms of enthusiasm. Last year there were two breakdowns, the one with Traquair, winning the Coventry Stakes, the other with Slieve Gallion. In 1906, what copious gushings of laudation were heard after Ascot over the superlative merits of Black Arrow, Lally, and Colonia; and how doleful was the outcome. It has always been asserted that before Slieve Gallion ran at Ascot he had beaten Rocketter at even weights. That the two-year-old had won the trial was no doubt true, but I do not for a moment believe that the pair had met at even weights.

Gallinule filled the third place in the list of last year's winning sires, having sixteen winners, with a total of over £16,300. Next season he will have lost Pretty Polly, but Hammerkop and Poussin may each win a long distance race and Rocketter ought to distinguish himself in T.Y.C. events. Slieve Gallion is, of course, Gallinule's most hopeful three-year-old, and Weathercock, having been long amiss, may turn out to have lost his form altogether. Some of Gallinule's two-year-olds are highly thought of, and if two or three of these animals turn out to be really smart when it comes to racing them, they will keep their sire well to the fore even if Slieve Gallion disappoints his friends.

Some shrewd judges at Newmarket appear to be of the opinion that Galvani will turn out a failure as a Derby colt, and they consider that Baltinglass will be Major Loder's best candidate for Epsom. I mentioned this colt long ago as likely to improve prodigiously on his two-year-old form, as he was ridiculously backward when he finished third to My Pet II. and Candahar for the Dewhurst Plate. Baltinglass obviously wanted time, and no serious attempt was made to train him for his two-year-old engagements. This was a very wise policy. If Baltinglass lost the Two Thousand and Derby he has two nice engagements at Ascot, the Ascot Derby and the St. James's Palace Stakes, with a 7lb maiden allowance in each race.

Radium, who was one of the great disappointments of last year, has been doing well during the winter, and it is quite expected that he will retrieve his reputation next season. Radium is intended to run for the Newmarket Biennial (four-year-old heat) on the third day of the Craven Meeting, and this will be a most interesting race if Mr. de Rothschild's horse is opposed by Troutbeck, who would have 21 lb. the worst of the weights. If the pair meet on these terms, to run over the Cesarewitch course, I shall expect Radium to win easily.

The latest introduction into the Derby betting is Colonel Baird's Woolwinder, by Martagon out of St. Windeline. This colt won the Alington Plate at the Newmarket Second October Meeting, and second to him was the Duke of Devonshire's Hillsprite, beaten two lengths. Woolwinder has no engagement at the Newmarket Spring Meeting, and I hear that it is intended to run him for the Dee Stakes at Chester. The colt has escaped a penalty for that race, and it seems to me that it will be full time to think of backing him for the Derby when he has won his Chester engagement. A victory in the Dee Stakes would not bring him to much shorter odds than the price at which he was so impetuously backed last week.

The death of Mr. C. W. Alcock, the secretary of the Surrey Cricket Club, means to that club the loss of a devoted and industrious official. To the historian of sport his work will be singularly interesting. To him as much as to any one is due the change that in the last five-and-twenty years has come over cricket and football. In cricket he had undertaken from the first the arrangement of the Australian cricket tours. In Association football he proposed the change which legalised the position of professional footballers under Association rules. Of the propriety of this change he was convinced for some years before he could secure the necessary majority. From 1866 to 1886 he was honorary secretary of the Football Association, and subsequently held the post for a time at a salary. He was appointed secretary of the Surrey Club in 1872. The work with which he was so prominently connected has resulted in both cricket and football being run on strictly business lines, and both directly and indirectly his influence was very wide. The original success of the Australian cricket tours was due to him in a considerable measure. Their visits whetted the public appetite for cricket, and paved the way for the development of first-class county cricket. The glorious successes of Surrey cricket when Lockwood, Lohmann, Abel, W. W. Read, M. Read, and others were in their prime induced other counties to start the game. Surrey was ready to help them. The mammoth cricket programmes of first-class cricket were started with Surrey. True, at first all such matches were not first-class, and the county championship table was rather a vague classification. One fact remained, that the county admittedly at the top of the tree could play practically twice a week from early May to mid-September. The possibility of the county programme being so materially increased was first indicated by the way in which the Surrey team started long programmes. Under Mr. Alcock's secretaryship was built up the stern reality of modern business cricket. If there were not men in the county let them come from elsewhere. As for the cricket itself, it was not for Surrey to have a cricket week at Reigate or elsewhere. The social amenities of the game were not for Surrey. Yorkshire could have a week at Scarborough, Lord's might rejoice in the University match or Eton and Harrow. But at the Oval, under the shadow of the gasometers, the business side of cricket was exemplified in every way. Let those who would yearn for happier days read the article by Mr. Rudd in this week's Field on County cricket. He deplores the weary round, the common task of ordinary first-class cricket. He pleads for shorter programmes; he argues for pleasant cricket weeks; he mourns that Kent is enlarging its match list to give the younger players a chance. And I mourn too. For I had rather watch a couple of hours' cricket at Canterbury in the "week" than a three days' match at the Oval. Mr. Alcock built up Surrey cricket on certain lines. The effect on his great rivals at Lord's illustrated the maxim that action and reaction are equal and opposite. The counties had to agree to let men off to play in the Gentlemen and Players match at Lord's. There was no time for representative teams to meet at the Oval. On the other hand, the M.C.C. matches with the counties fail to attract either spectators or players, for there are none to spare.

In football the effect of his policy was even more marked. It is not the paid player, but his manager, who runs the game. It was not likely that he would consider that the player should have anything more to do with the conduct of the game than the professional cricketer, who is but the servant of the club. The sport has become a business. The amateur has been neglected. I do not doubt that Mr. Alcock himself scarcely realised that matters would be pushed to such an extreme. He certainly occupied a prominent position in making both cricket and football businesses. It was his business to do so. But it must not be thought that he was all business. Few kinder men ever lived, and I have known him in after years show kindness to men who as youngsters had known his son who died years ago, and by whom they had been introduced to his father. He had a great faculty of recalling faces and names, and he will be missed not only at the Oval.

Those who work out the times of the University crews at practice on the tideway have every prospect of being provided with a very enjoyable time. Cambridge went over the whole course, and within twenty-four hours Oxford did likewise, and only took three seconds more than Cambridge. They were twelve seconds longer for the mile, seventeen seconds behind the Light Blues at Hammersmith, twelve seconds slower at Chiswick Church, ten at Barnes Bridge, and three at the finish. Naturally Oxford were very pleased with themselves. But the unreliability of times was best shown in the practice for the Harvard race, when our visitors did a record over the course in a trial, and could never be said to have pressed Cambridge after the first half-mile. On the form of the crews Cambridge ought to win. Their stroke is longer, they have a better leg drive than the Dark Blues, and they do not slip the finish. It is all nonsense to say that they row like a crew of scullers.

At Oxford there was a record amount of bumping in the Torpids. On one afternoon the crews in the second division made the highest possible number of bumps. Balliol, using short Belgian oars with big blades, went head. The only crew to go up each of the six days was St. John's, which was the heaviest eight on the river, except Balliol II. Trinity were the next best crew to the headship. They made four bumps, and only averaged 11 st. a man. Keble ought to have gone up six places, but they failed against New College II., who were by no means a fast crew.

At Cambridge the Lent races were held in gloriously fine spring weather. On the four nights fifty-eight bumps were made. Downing, for the first time for over thirty years, made a bump each night, and the other crews that got their oars were Caius, Queen's, and the third boats of Lady Margaret, Christ's, and Pembroke. Jesus went head, bumping First Trinity. The rowing was not too good, but then the frost had interfered with training.

At Mentone, Mr. J. G. Ritchie has been having a good time at lawn tennis. He won the final of the mixed doubles with Miss Salusbury, and he was successful in the singles, beating G. M. Simond in the final, while those two players had little difficulty in defeating De Bray and Ermeloff in the men's doubles. Miss Salusbury won the ladies' competition.

The National Cross-country Championships were held at Colwall Park, near Malvern, and there was a record entry of twenty-eight clubs. The Birchfield Harriers were easily first, and the Highgate Harriers came second. By way of compensation, Pearce, of the Highgate Harriers, was first man home, Deakin, of the Hearne Hill team, was only ten seconds behind, and then, at a fair interval, came Underwood, of the winning team.

Five-and-twenty years ago the Clapham Rovers F.C. beat the Old Etonians in the final of the Association Cup. They used to run both Rugby and Association teams. The Rugby team, which was a power in Metropolitan circles, has vanished. The Association team is scarcely flourishing. I hope it will do better. At the club's annual dinner there was a big gathering, and some important speeches were made by those who are taking an active part in the difficulties that have arisen with regard to the attitude of the Football Association towards amateurs. It was stated that the amateurs had got their house in order for a secession, if that course became necessary. It would rest with the Council's meeting on March 11 as to whether or not the amateurs would continue under the rules of the F.A. There is a similar feeling of dissatisfaction with the ruling authorities both in Scotland and Ireland. Similar statements were made at the dinner of the Townley F.C. There is no doubt that the amateurs mean business.

It looks as though there would be a split between the National Cyclists' Union and the Amateur Athletic Association. Now the Union is threatening to take up, or rather, has sanctioned, professional running races at its meetings. If this course is persisted in there will be only one course for the A.A.A., and that will be to debar all amateur cyclists racing under N.C.U. rules from competing at A.A.A. sports. The N.C.U. ought to have no more to do with foot racing than the Cyclists' Touring Club with motorists.

It is to be hoped that the members of the C.T.C. will bestir themselves to reorganise their club both as to rulers and finance. Those who wish a change have a sound leader in the Hon. Gilbert Coleridge.

Stock Markets Irregular—Why Business is Quiet—Money at Present Wanted for Trade Purposes—The Turn of the Stock Exchange will Come Later—The Money Market and the Aldrich Bill—The Japanese Conversion Loan.

THE past week in the Stock Markets has been characterised by great irregularity. Generally speaking, however, the tendency at the end was considerably brighter than at the commencement of the period. Markets all round continue under the shadow of dear money, and for the present speculation outside one or two specialities remains at a very low ebb. It is not, as I explained last week, that want of confidence is felt in the outlook; on the contrary, the situation as measured by the state of trade at home and abroad, by the quiescence of international politics, by the dividends being earned on the stocks of leading railway and other companies, and by the healthy condition of the National Exchequer (to name no other factors) gives rise to feelings of pronounced optimism. But the fact must be kept prominently in mind that periods of bumper trade and of high commodity prices do not as a rule coincide with general stock market activity. Just now merchants and manufacturers require all their surplus credit for the development of their own businesses, and will not look at securities unless the rate of interest be specially attractive. Hence such indifferent results as those achieved by the West Australian Government with its offer of three and a half per cent. stock at 97 and by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway over its issue of £1,000,000 four per cent. bonds at par. The turn of the Stock Exchange will come later, when the inevitable trade reaction sets in, and then, according to precedent, Throgmorton-street will be in the throes of a boom. An important development last week was the passing by the United States Senate of the Aldrich Bill for currency reform, under which the credits of the banks may be fortified by the deposit with them of Customs receipts instead of the lock up of such funds in the Treasury. In view of the fact that the strained financial position in the United States has been mainly responsible for the long maintenance of our present high Bank Rate, the measure which has now been ratified by the House of Representatives possesses great interest for the London money market. Whether, however, it will involve an immediate reduction in the official minimum is open to some doubt. In any case, however, it is permissible to look for some relaxation in outside money rates during the next fortnight, because of the preparations always made by the Japanese Government prior to the issue of a new loan. It is now generally understood that the Japanese Conversion issue will take the form of five per cent. bonds, and, according to current reports, the prospectus will be before the public within the next fortnight. To summarise in a sentence the features of stock market activity during the past week, I might mention the continued buoyancy of Grand Trunks, Mexican Rails, and Rio Tintos; the rally that followed a further severe break in Home Rails; and the fresh triumph achieved by the "bears" of Americans in consequence largely of the latest Harriman disclosures, and the continuance of the stream of railroad short term notes at flood tide.

Home Rails Improving—Further Break Succeeded by a Partial Recovery—The Traffic Position—Promising "Trade" Stocks—York Deferred and Hulls—The Fall in Brighton A.

After slumping without a show of resistance during the first part of last week, Home Railway stocks showed a distinctly better tendency towards the end of the period, and on balance the losses have been restricted to comparatively small proportions, while a few stocks are actually higher. While many arguments could be advanced as to why values should improve, last week's rally was sufficiently explained by the fact that it followed a decline altogether disproportionate to the amount of stock actually sold. In a narrow market such as now exists for Home Rails, it is not difficult to bring about a rapid movement either in favour of or against holders. For some time the dealers have kept down the amounts of stock carried on their books to a minimum, and it has accordingly been practically impossible to realise a large line without breaking the market. For the same reason a moderate increase in the demand from the public causes an undue commotion, the jobbers being compelled to see prices move up against them in their effort to meet the inquiry. The improvement that set in a week ago was without doubt the direct result of a demand from real investors who were tempted by the unusually low level of prices and high yields. The traffic returns on the whole were encouraging, particularly as the increases in most cases occurred on top of substantial gains a year ago. My readers may obtain a comprehensive idea of current earnings from the following table:—

coaching business, to which I referred a week ago, is still very marked. Taking last week alone, the receipts of thirty-eight railways in the United Kingdom showed an actual decrease of £13,100 in passengers and an increase of £23,600 in goods, while the results of these same thirty-eight lines for the first two months of the current half-year disclose the fact that while goods receipts have expanded by £269,000, passenger takings have practically stood still, the exact outcome being a decline of £5,600. It is to be hoped that with the advent of better weather, coaching business will now begin to pick up, but as regards more particularly those companies operating largely in the metropolitan and suburban area there is unfortunately too much reason to believe that competition more than bad weather accounts for the losses in passenger revenue.

While this distinctive characteristic in railway earnings continues it is natural to expect that investors will give the preference to stocks in the "trade" group. Perhaps one of the most promising stocks in this section is Great Northern Deferred. It must be confessed that the York dividend in respect of 1906 was a little disappointing, owing to a big increase in working costs, and the loss involved by the Grantham accident. These, however, constitute "bull" points for the current year. The Grantham disaster alone entailed a draft upon the revenue of 1906 of £16,700, which represents practically ¼ per cent. upon the deferred stock. In other words, if the net revenue earned in 1906 be maintained during 1907, and there be no repetition of the lamentable Grantham affair, York Deferred will receive 2 per cent. instead of 1¾ per cent., which would thereby give a yield of over 4¾ per cent. to a present purchaser. Owing to high prices for coal and other materials, the board may have to face a further increase in the ratio of expenditure to receipts, but in this connection it is reassuring to observe that already for two months gross takings show a published increase of £25,000, while I may also recall the fact that £10,000 additional out of the profits of the past half-year was set aside to contingency fund. Hull and Barnsley ordinary, too, is another stock that is well worth attention. The dividend for 1906 was 2¼ per cent., so that at present price the stock yields 4¾ per cent. Moreover, earning prospects continue bright, the company having for eight weeks a published traffic gain of £10,600, equal to 14 per cent. If this rate of progress be continued, or anything like it, a further increase in the dividend is practically certain next February, even after allowing for the possibility of an increase in fixed charges in connection with the proposed issue of £300,000 preference stock. The solid attractions of the "Heavies" are apparent, when it is pointed out that such stocks as North-Westerns, Midland Deferred, and North-Easterns yield 4⅜ to 4½ per cent. on the basis of last year's dividends, and that traffics are steadily expanding. In the southern passenger group, while earnings have not been very encouraging, the market has shown a great readiness to discount the recent declines in gross revenue. Brighton "A" last week touched 94¼; this represented a drop of nearly 30 points since the commencement of the year, while even allowing for the subsequent rally the stock remains at the lowest level for twenty-one years. Of course, it is no use blinking one's eyes to the serious falling off that has lately been shown in receipts—amounting to £21,000 for two months—and the market will scrutinise traffic returns very closely during the next few weeks in order to see how far the recent losses have been due to the temporary influence of unfavourable weather, and how far to the more enduring influence of rival tramways and motors. The electrification of the South London line will not come too soon to help in stemming the tide of competition. Another undertaking that when completed will be equally welcome is the rebuilding of Victoria Station. The inconvenience that the company's regular patrons have had to endure since the station was given over to the British workman has been no trifle, and it seems a great pity that the board does not take steps to hurry the work a little more. Below appears my usual table:—

Canadian Rails Active—Grand Trunks Steadily Absorbed—The January Revenue Statements—Quebec and Lake St. John Developments—Mexican Rails—Has the Rise in the Ordinary been Overdone?—Renewed Demand for Interoceanics.

The market for Colonial and Foreign Rails was perhaps the most active in the House last week, and in one or two instances prices were taken along by the "bulls" with a determination that contrasted strongly with the lethargy shown in neighbouring departments. In the Canadian group liberal support was again extended to Grand Trunk issues, and evidence was afforded at the Carry-Over that stocks of this line, and particularly the third preference, are being steadily accumulated by investors, who are being brought to recognise the big potentialities that attach to the securities of the company. Brokers tell me that from £60,000 to £70,000 of third preference has been lifted from the market at each of the last two or three Settlements. The ordinary, too, has not been allowed to go a-begging, heavy buying taking place in connection, so it was said, with call options entered into on behalf of Paris operators. I demonstrated a week or two ago how much dearer Little Trunks were as compared with the third preference, and without going over old ground, would again utter a word of caution to would-be purchasers. The ordinary must not be regarded as anything more than a gambling counter; if people choose to gamble in it I raise no objection, but they will only have themselves to blame if they are led away by highly-coloured stories about dividends into buying the stock as an investment. I do not, of course, wish to deny that Trunk ordinary might not one day be worth more than its present price on merits, but the present quotation probably discounts fully the position for some years ahead, and while on the one hand it is almost impossible to conceive circumstances that would justify any early rise, there is, on the other hand, plenty of scope for unfavourable events that must assuredly operate against the stock. Already the market has had a mild shock in the shape of the January revenue statement. In view of the advance of £70,800 in gross receipts for the month the market had not unreasonably expected an increase of £12,000 in the net takings. The actual result is a paltry gain of £2,400. It is premature to discuss dividend prospects on the basis of one month's results; perhaps there were temporary causes such as the clearance of snow on the track to account for this very big advance in working costs. But remembering the cautionary words recently uttered by the general manager great things in the way of net receipts must not be looked for this year. I do not depart from my view as to the cheapness of the third preference, because it already yields about 4¼ per cent. on the basis of a 3 per cent. dividend, and the payment of the further 1 per cent. to which the stock is entitled can hardly be a matter of very long waiting. But the January figures are likely to check undue "bull" enthusiasm, and the stock ought not to be bought at the moment unless the purchaser is willing to take up.

Canadian Pacifics have continued to fluctuate erratically in sympathy with American Rails. The January revenue statement, like that of the Trunk, showed a substantial increase in working expenses, which, added to the decline of $217,000 in gross receipts, gave a reduction of $719,000 in net. In view, however, of the congestion on the line caused by its snowed up condition, the result found the market prepared, and operators were disposed to pay more attention to the fact that the company has resumed its normal rate of expansion in gross earnings—as the gain of $195,000 for the third week of February testifies. A feature among minor Canadian Rails has been a rise of several points in the income bonds of the Quebec and Lake St. John. The demand was based on a cablegram to the effect that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, the promoters of the Canadian Northern Railway, have secured control. The Quebec and Lake St. John line runs north from Quebec to Roberval, a distance of 190 miles, and the plan contemplated is to extend the railway to James Bay, Hudson's Bay, through a valuable mineral area. How quotations of Colonial and Foreign Rails have moved recently may be seen from the following table:—

Mexican Rails have again monopolised chief attention in the Foreign group, the rise in the Ordinary being quite sensational. This stock, which is in receipt of no dividend and has earned nothing for sixteen years, has, since the beginning of the year, been rushed up from 46 to over 60. As to what exactly has caused the jump the market does not itself seem to be able to agree. There have been stories of Government buying for control, of some reorganisation plan that would benefit the junior securities, and of phenomenal savings by the use of liquid fuel, but none of these have seemed very conclusive. Another rumour is that the Ordinary will get a dividend of anything up to 4 per cent. in May. On that point I cannot help feeling very sceptical. As I showed when dealing with the company's position on February 13, if working expenses were at the same rate during the second half of 1906 as in the corresponding period of 1905, it is difficult to see how the board can do more than pay down to the full rate on the First preference, while if the percentage of operating costs be pulled down from 61 per cent. to 55 per cent. it will still be impossible, according to the published gross receipts, to pay more than 4 per cent. per annum for the six months on the Seconds. True, current earnings are very good and the ordinary may get a small dividend in respect of the current year, but the market seems to have discounted prospects with no sparing hand. The boom in the stocks of the old Mexican Railway has spread to Interoceanics, the preference having risen to 13, while the ordinary, after a period of somnolence, was trotted out and has climbed to 3. A good case might still be made out for the £10 preference, in view of the big earnings and of those interest arrears (amounting to more than the nominal value of the shares) which must be funded one day.

"Bear" Activity in Americans—Fresh Low Records Established—Missouri Kansas a Strong Exception—The Harriman Investigation—More Short Term Note Issues—The Aldrich Bill.

For the greater part of last week the American market was in a state of acute weakness. Not for a long time have the "bears" held such high carnival, and the determined manner in which certain individual stocks were attacked must have involved some heavy losses to "bull" pools. Practically until Thursday the market failed to show any sign of rallying, and on that day fresh low records were established by many stocks. There is no doubt that the resumption of the Harriman inquiry by the Inter-State Commerce Commission was the effective weapon used by operators for the fall; if proof of this were needed, it was afforded by the rush to cover which followed the news that the investigation had been adjourned indefinitely. One strong exception was provided throughout the week by Missouri, Kansas and Texas Common. These shares touched a new high record on the continued satisfactory growth in earnings and persistent reports that a 2 per cent. dividend will be paid this year. Another helpful factor was the announcement that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided in favour of the railroad in the action brought against it by the Kansas State authorities for ownership of some valuable tracts of coal and farming lands in the Indian territory. It may be remembered that the State demanded to be recognised as trustees for the railway company in regard to the ownership of these lands.

Apart from Missouris, prices on the week show a further all-round decline, as may be seen from the following table:—

It has been argued that last week's examination of the Union Pacific officials failed to provide the sensations that were expected. The contention only serves to demonstrate what strong meat in the way of scandal Wall Street was prepared to devour. Surely the history of the Chicago and Alton deal alone was a sufficiently lurid revelation of the methods that have been employed by certain devotees of Wall Street high finance. It was brought out that bonds of the Alton Company were sold to the New York Life Assurance Company at a profit of $3,000,000, and that extraordinary expenditure of $12,444,000 incurred during previous years had been capitalised, to permit the declaration of a 30 per cent. dividend. Arising out of this disclosure, a rumour was circulated that the Wall Street attorney, Mr. Samuel Untermeyer, who was conspicuous in the recent Insurance contest, had been retained by a number of Union Pacific stockholders to sue the Harriman associates in the Alton syndicate for the purpose of forcing restitution at least of part of the profits they made. Speaking in a general sense, the results of the inquiry have left the New York market in a nervous frame of mind. It is recognised that the purpose of the investigation was to demonstrate the desirability or necessity for more stringent control of railroad companies by the Government, especially in the issue of capital and purchases of stocks of other companies, on account of the bearing on freight rates which these matters have. As far as the impression on the public mind is concerned, the inquiry will do much to strengthen the Government's contention and advance the efforts to secure legislation for the furtherance of its aims.

Meanwhile the market gets no rest from the railroad borrower. Last week the Louisville and Nashville placed with Messrs. J. P. Morgan $6,500,000 of Five per Cent. Three-year Notes at a cost, including interest and commission, of 6¼ per cent., while the same firm bought $5,000,000 of Short-term Notes from the Atlantic Coast Line on identical terms. The Reading and Baltimore and Ohio are said by Wall Street to be the next applicants for funds. The steady flow of short-dated paper is not tending to improve Wall Street's digestion. Already a number of the issues recently placed are selling below the subscription price, and the significance of this upon values of existing junior stocks needs no emphasising. Under all the circumstances, the passage through the United States Senate of the Aldrich Bill by 43 votes to 14 did not have the effect that had been anticipated. When the news came through that the Bill had passed, London operators bid with some eagerness for stocks, but their enthusiasm found no responsive echo in New York—speculators there being otherwise engaged. As I have before explained, the provision of the Bill which mainly affects the market is that which allows the Treasury to deposit Customs revenue with the National Banks, but its effect appears to be merely permissive, so that the expected relief would still apparently depend on the United States Treasurer. If the Treasurer exercises his full power under the Bill it is estimated that some eight or ten millions sterling will be deposited with the banks and enable them to expand their credits materially. The Bill, which has now received the final assent of both Chambers, is certainly a step in the right direction, although so far as the immediate future is concerned it is possible that the relief afforded to the Money Market might be only temporary, having regard to the new capital hunger of the railroads and other corporations and the encouragement that would be given to borrowers by the increase in banking credits.

Kaffir Gold Shares Inactive—The Labour Outlook—Deep Level Developments—Fair Business in Diamond Descriptions—Jagers Dividend Prospects—Premier Report.

On the whole there has been little doing among Kaffir gold shares during the past week, and prices, as a rule, have merely fluctuated within narrow limits. The general disposition on the part of speculators is still to await a pronouncement of policy by the new Transvaal legislature on the important question of labour, although it is not believed that any action detrimental to the interests of the mining industry is likely to be taken. Apart from the definite statements of a reassuring character made before the elections on behalf of the Boers and Nationalists, who have secured a victory at the polls, there is the fact that interference with the labour supply of the mines would render it more difficult for the Boer farmers to secure native labourers for agricultural work, and to seriously restrict the operations of the mines would have the effect of spoiling the farmers' chances of marketing their produce. This likelihood of interference with the mining industry adversely affecting the interests of the Boers themselves is a reassuring influence of no small importance. In a message recently to hand from Johannesburg the opinion is expressed that the alarm at the possible antagonism of the Boer Cabinet to the mining industry is unwarranted, and it is suggested that "the Government will probably extend the Chinese labour contracts for one year, pending a report on the possible supply of aboriginal labour." The question as to the re-engagement of the Chinese, whose contracts expire during the current year, is one of considerable importance, as if such action is disallowed there will be a steady exodus of coolies from the Rand after June next, when the three years' contracts of the first arrivals are due to expire. As I have shown, it will be to the interests of the Boers themselves to extend the contracts as suggested, but there is the Home Government to be taken into consideration in this matter. It is to be remembered that under the new Constitution granted to the Transvaal the Home Government reserved to itself a power of veto in regard to the Chinese labour question, and this power it might use with a view to preventing the re-engagement of the coolies. Opinion on this point in market circles, however, is that it is very doubtful whether the Home Government would interfere seeing that it professedly left the colony to decide for itself as to what should be done in regard to the Chinese. Were such action as extending the contracts to be taken by a legislature mainly composed of members of the Progressive party, it is thought the Home Ministry would be more likely to exercise its power of veto than in the event of the present Het Volk-Nationalist majority adopting that policy. Moreover, to deplete the labour supply of the mines would have the effect of rendering the commercial depression in the Transvaal more acute, and it is inconceivable that the British Government would deliberately, in face of the opinion of the representatives elected by the colonists themselves, take action calculated to have such a distressing result. All things considered, therefore, it appears improbable that the Chinese labour supply will be tampered with, at any rate, until there is some other class of labour to take its place. In this connection it is to be borne in mind that an equivalent number of natives would not be a satisfactory substitute, as natives will not enter into contracts for anything like as long a period as the Chinese have done, and a fluctuating supply is inimical to the progress of the industry. As the President of the Transvaal Chamber of Mines pointed out at the annual meeting at Johannesburg on the 28th ultimo, even a surplus of 10,000 natives would not compensate the Rand for the removal of 53,000 Chinese, for the native labour supply had been, and would be, irregular and subject to serious fluctuation. "Our work here," he continued, "to be completely successful must be permanent and continuous, and we must endeavour to regulate our supplies of unskilled labourers so as to ensure permanency and regularity of supply and, therefore, regular working of the mines."

One bright spot in the Kaffir market during the last week was the inquiry for some of the deep-level issues. Among the smaller-priced shares, Knight Centrals have been favoured, in view of the further news from the mine. The recent records as to the development of this property have been highly satisfactory, and have considerably improved the prospect of a good quantity of good-grade material being opened up, which is consoling to the shareholders in view of the low grade of the ore that was proved hitherto. It is a satisfactory feature, too, that the Knight Central is not the only deep-level mine which has been developing better of late. At the meeting of the Witwatersrand Deep, held a fortnight ago at Johannesburg, the chairman emphasised the general improvement recently shown in the development of the deep-level mines on the eastern section of the Witwatersrand, mentioning Knight Central and Witwatersrand Deep, also Angelo Deep and Cinderella Deep. He also referred to the Van Dyk, New Kleinfontein, and New Modderfontein, and observed that the profitable life of this whole area was estimated even six months ago. As regards deep-level propositions on other parts of the Rand, it is worthy of note that the quarterly report of the Village Deep just to hand contains the satisfactory information that the 5th and 6th levels, which are being started on the main reef leader at No. 1 shaft, are showing much better values than have been exposed in the levels immediately above. In the case of the Rose Deep, an expansion of profits is foreshadowed, and Robinson Deep, as I pointed out a few weeks ago, is also likely to increase its production shortly.

In the Diamond group there has been a fair amount of business transacted. Profit-taking followed the rise in De Beers to over 30, with the result that they have dropped under that price. These shares still carry the right to the 17s. 6d. per share interim dividend. If the final distribution next June is no larger, the yield on the shares at the current price would be about 6 per cent., but it is believed that the directors will see their way to pay the £1 per share next time. In regard to the market rumour I mentioned last week as to the distribution due to be announced at the end of the current month on Jagers, I am now assured by one who is evidently well informed that there is not likely to be any increase in the amount as compared with the 6s. per share announced last September, the reason given being that the company's operations were hindered for some time during the present financial year by a shortage of water for washing purposes. The company, I gather, has been spending some of its profits on arrangements to ensure a regular supply of water. The difficulty has now been overcome, and it is expected that it will not be long before shareholders reap the benefit of the conservative policy that has been adopted. It being the custom on the Stock Exchange to anticipate events, it is considered probable that the price of the shares will move up in advance of the improvement in the rate of dividend which it is thought will take place during the financial year due to commence shortly. The issue of the annual report of the Premier (Transvaal) Diamond has served to attract rather more attention to its shares. As was remarked in the market, the report is "not brilliant," but it makes a rather better showing than its predecessor, the profit being £673,349, compared with £622,633 for the preceding twelve months. A further large sum has been expended out of revenue on equipment, and no less than £370,453 has been paid to the Transvaal Government in respect of its 60 per cent. share of the profits. It is hoped that the new Transvaal Legislature will be willing to reduce the tax, which in the case of this mine has thus called for a sum equivalent to about three-fourths of the whole amount paid by the gold-mining companies of the Rand in respect of the 10 per cent. tax on their profits. In order to provide for the payment of regular dividends, the directors state that the sum of £640,000, representing the stock of diamonds, must be made available, and the establishment of a trading fund is under consideration. A water supply is now ensured, but additional washing plant is needed. It is stated, however, that provision for this will not affect the distribution of future profits. Rhodesians have continued to move pretty much in sympathy with Kaffirs, and have presented no particular feature.

The Slight Expansion of Interest in Westralians Maintained—Spurt in Horseshoes—Lake View Position—L. and W.A. Exploration Report—Deep Leads Lower.

The slight expansion of interest in the Westralian market which I recorded in my last notes has been fully maintained during the past week, fresh points in regard to some of the companies concerned having come along, and in a few cases share values have been affected to a fairly substantial extent. The chief feature has been the strength of Golden Horseshoes, but apart from the fact that Paris speculators are credited with taking the shares in hand once again and renewed talk of favourable developments in the mine, no reason transpired to account for the advance in the quotation which, it will be seen, is the largest movement in the group on the week:—

Kalgurlis have been helped by the news from the mine, and by the declaration of a further dividend of 7s. 6d. per share, while Great Fingalls have been realised in view of the ore-reserves statement on which I commented last week. It may be remembered that I pointed out that the price then ruling allowed a large margin for possibilities. However, big mines like this take a long time to work out, and it is quite on the cards that the two-and-a-half years' life estimated by the managers on the basis of the ore developed will be considerably extended. The Lake View Consols is a striking example of the way big properties have of remaining payable propositions. Years ago it was thought the Lake View mine was practically at the end of its career as a profitable gold producer, but it is still earning profits, thanks largely to the drastic reduction in working expenses the managers have been able to effect, and the ore reserves estimate just published shows that it has about a year's supply still in sight. At the end of 1906 the Lake View's reserves were estimated at 140,158 tons, of an average value of 29s. 3d. per ton, compared with 121,474 tons, averaging 30s. 9d. per ton at the end of June last. The latest figures represent profit in sight to the extent of only a few shillings per share, but of course the price of Lake View shares is not based solely upon the prospects of the mine at Kalgurli the company having interests in other parts of the world, the chief of which is a large shareholding in the Broken Hill South Blocks. Another concern which originally was principally interested in West Australian mines, but has of late extended its operations, is the London and W.A. Exploration Co., whose report has come to hand during the past week. As I ventured to predict, this report heralds the return of the company to the list of dividend-payers, the amount the directors recommend being 1s. per share. The net profit on the past year's working was £25,896, which compares with £21,266 for the sixteen months ended December, 1905, so that the company has certainly made satisfactory progress. After wiping out the debit balance brought forward from 1905 and paying the proposed dividend there will remain about £5,000 to be carried forward. Besides acquiring a large interest in a deep lead property, the company during the last twelve months also acquired an interest in a company formed for the purpose of exploiting an important silver-lead property in Burma. A few weeks ago I directed attention to the more promising outlook opened up for the Cosmopolitan Proprietary by the developments on the new north chute. In this connection a cable to hand during the past week is of interest, it being officially announced that, in view of the satisfactory dimensions and value of the new chute at the No. 11 level, it has been decided to commence extending the No. 12 level immediately in the hope of proving the new ore body at still greater depth. News of a cheering nature for Lancefield shareholders has also come to hand, Mr. Hoover, of Messrs. Bewick, Moreing, and Co., having cabled that the reorganised furnaces are working admirably, and that the plant will be a complete success. This company had to raise fresh capital to provide special plant for the treatment of the refractory ore, and the first results with the new machinery were not as satisfactory as had been hoped, so that modifications were made, with the result now cabled. The mine is a large low-grade proposition, and the shares seem a fair speculative lock-up.

Deep lead descriptions have suffered a further set-back, the delay in getting into the deepest part of the wash at the Loddon Valley being mainly responsible. The additional information to hand by cable from this property during the week goes to show that further work will have to be done before it will be possible to enter the part of the lead which is expected to give the best results. The continued delay is disappointing, but those who have taken up shares should not give in at this stage.

Continued Activity in Copper Shares—Tintos Establish a Fresh High Record and Great Cobars come into Favour—Extensive Dealings in Zincs and a Surprising Development—Esperanzas and the Official Figures—The Mysore Annual Report.

The copper group has continued one of the most active sections of the House, and among these descriptions Rio Tintos have continued a prominent feature. A large business has again been transacted in these shares on London and Continental account, and it seems probable that pending the annual meeting, which is due to be held in April, they will remain a favourite with speculators. No official announcement having been made with regard to the reported expansion of operations, it is thought that the statement is being reserved for the meeting. Following their rise to 105, the shares relapsed on profit-taking, but have since recovered and passed 109, partly as a result of further forced closing of "bear" commitments, while the rise in the price of the metal has naturally had a favourable influence upon these and copper shares generally. Market men are anticipating that the next dividend will be £3 per share, as compared with 50s. in October last. In the case of Anacondas, which have fluctuated mainly in sympathy with Yankee rails, a further increase in the dividend is being talked of, but the price does not seem able to make much headway without inducing realisations. An improving tendency has latterly been displayed by the Australian copper descriptions, particularly Great Cobars, which have been helped by a favourable cable as to developments, and market talk as to profit prospects. Recent operators in Tintos are said to be transferring their attentions to Great Cobars, and a further advance in the quotation is predicted. The company is stated to be earning at the rate of £300,000 per annum, on the basis of an output of 100 tons of copper per week, and, with the new plant expected to be brought into operation before the end of the year, it is expected that the present rate of profits will be trebled. A dividend of at least 10s. per share is looked for in June. Mount Lyells, whose position I dealt with at some length last week, have also come into demand again, and those who took the hint to purchase the shares on the recent set-back are already on the right side.

In the Broken Hill group, Zinc Corporations have continued the chief feature; in fact, the attention paid to the shares of this concern has overshadowed the rest of the list. Dealings in Zincs have been on a very extensive scale, one firm being credited with having disposed of some ten thousand shares in one day. A further substantial decline in the quotation has been witnessed, but at a little below 30s. influential support has been forthcoming. On Friday news was published of a surprising development in connection with the corporation's affairs, it being officially announced that it had been thought advisable to remove Mr. A. Queneau from the control. No reason was given for this action, the board promising a full statement as soon as possible after the arrival of the two members of the board on their way to Broken Hill. This is awaited with considerable interest for information as to the state of the plant and as to the time when it may be expected to be in proper running order and commercial results produced. Meanwhile the official announcement referred to above has given renewed heart of grace to the "bears," who hold to their assertions as to there being something seriously wrong with the plant; but the officials apparently remain confident of ultimate success. The fall in Zincs restricted business in other Broken Hill descriptions and depressed the group as a whole, but since the issue of the official statement referred to above, the prices have rallied somewhat, and it is believed that the worst has now been experienced. At any rate, it is a favourable sign that Colonial speculators have sent over buying orders for some of the Barrier shares, and those among my readers who are on the look out for mining speculations of promise, and who are prepared to take their purchases off the market, might do worse than pick up some of the shares of this group at the current level of values. The position of the principal mines is sound, the prices of the metals they produce remain at a satisfactory level, and there are prospects of increased dividends, as I pointed out last week in referring to the Proprietary Company.

Siberians and West Africans have come in for little attention, but a fair amount of business has been transacted in American gold shares. The official announcement as to the Esperanza's position, on which I commented last week, had a depressing effect upon those shares and others of the group, but prices have rallied since. Esperanzas dropped away to 2 3-16 on the statement showing a marked falling off in the profit represented by the ore in reserve, but, as the following table shows, they have recovered to 2½, the price I mentioned last week as fully representing their value on the latest figures:—

Indians have been a quiet market. The annual report of the Mysore Company is now to hand, and, as was anticipated, it makes a favourable showing in regard to the important matter of ore reserves, thanks to the very satisfactory manner in which the mine has been opening up of late. The estimated reserves are equivalent to fully four years' supply for the treatment plant, calculating on the basis of the tonnage treated during the last twelve months. Four years' dividends at the 1906 rate of distribution would amount to £2 16s. per share, while the present market valuation represents over eight years' purchase, allowing only for the return of capital.

"Heads We Win, Tails You Lose."

Eastwood and Co., 76, Bishopsgate-street Within, E.C., are just now distributing a circular in which they dilate upon the advantages of opening a three-monthly instead of a fortnightly account on a marginal basis. It may be useful to give the experiences of two customers of the firm from whom I have recently heard. The first opened an account with them on the fortnightly system, which they now depreciate. For some time after he had paid his deposit the shares in which he was dealing were on the down grade, and he duly remitted to Eastwood and Co. the debit balances shown by their fortnightly accounts. Then a rise occurred, which gave a balance of £30 or so in his favour, but on this occasion no account, let alone any cheque, came from the firm, nor have they even vouchsafed a reply to the customer's requests for payment. So much for the fortnightly system as operated by Eastwood and Co. The other customer opened a three-monthly account, and at the end of the first quarter he forwarded the firm additional cash amounting to nearly three times as much as his original deposit. By the end of the second three months the stock had risen, and he ought to have received back the whole of his money. But no communication of any kind was forthcoming from Eastwood and Co., and letters and telegrams on the subject have been left unanswered. It would appear from these two cases that there is not, after all, much difference in the result between a three-monthly and a fortnightly account with Eastwood and Co.; and speculators who do not care to be played with on the principle of "heads we win, tails you lose," will do well to avoid dealings with this firm.

"Taking Small Profits."

The circulars issued by the cover-snatching firm of Bertram, Seymour, and Co., Copthall House, E.C., harp upon the wisdom of "taking small profits." How ready these people are to practise what they preach, even at the expense of a poor deluded working-man, is shown by the following case, which can, I think, be best stated in the simple words of the unfortunate victim:—

> Early in December, 1906, I called on Bertram, Seymour and Co., seeing their article [no doubt this was an advertisement.—"Vigilant."] re investments in Daily Telegraph. They showed me an account in their books (in confidence) where one of their clients had by their books made a good deal out of little. On December 10 I received a letter advising purchase of Brighton Deferred stock. I wired them on December 11: "Am posting £2 for purchase advised," and posted the £2. I hear from them on the 12th to state that they have invested my little all in National Columbian First Debentures. I wrote and inquired why they had not bought the advised stock. (Had they done so I should have received a profit.) They replied that £5 was the lowest they could accept on Brightons; this was not told me before. They sent me a contract for Columbians at 103½. Seeing by Financial Times these were quoted at 102 and 102½, I wrote, and they enclosed another contract for 102½. Now (February 16) they write and say my £2 capital is exhausted. I am only a poor man, out of employment at present, and £2 is a fortune to me, as it represented all my spare cash.

Such mean, contemptible, unprincipled harpies as Bertram, Seymour, and Co., ought to be hounded out of the City.

More Bucket-shops.

"By judicious speculation Rockefeller, Morgan, Carnegie, Gould, Vanderbilt, Gates, Harriman, Fish, Herring, and nearly every millionaire and multi-millionaire amassed his enormous wealth." I cull this impressive sentence from a recent circular designed to persuade ambitious and avaricious simpletons that they, too, may grow rich beyond the dreams of avarice if they will only accept the disinterested advice of the National Share Exchange (secretary, John Collins), 22, Great Winchester-street, E.C., and deal in American railway shares on a 1 per cent. marginal basis. The would-be Rockefellers, etc., were exhorted to buy Atchisons, Canadas, and Missouris "for a ten-point rise which would return 1,000 per cent. profit." But with the malicious perversity which stocks almost invariably exhibit when a bucket-shop predicts a rise, Atchisons, Canadas, and Missouris all went down sufficiently to run off the cover, so that instead of that little 1,000 per cent. profit the potential millionaires were left lamenting a 100 per cent. loss. In expounding the great advantages of the cover-system, the N.S.E. intimates that it is "always prepared to accept transactions of this nature." Here at least I fully believe John Collins and Co.

Would you like to hear of a convenient, lucrative, and legitimate system by which, if you have capital invested in marketable shares of any description, you can—without any cash outlay and while still retaining your present holdings—very largely increase your income? Some philanthropists calling themselves the Securities Investment Company, 42, Old Broad-street, E.C., are ready to show you how the trick can be done—nay, in the goodness of their hearts, they undertake to work it for you. Here is one of the illustrations they give in a pamphlet on this wonderful system. Suppose you have £250 invested in a sound undertaking which brings you in 6 per cent. You hand over these shares as security to the company for an advance of £250. "With this amount you can buy ten times the number of the same or any other shares—viz., £2,500 worth. You still retain your original shares and receive the dividend from them, but besides this you receive the 6 per cent. dividends paid by the £2,500 extra shares." The 6 per cent. dividends will then amount altogether to £165 per annum. Out of this the company will take £100, being interest at 4 per cent. on the £2,500 they have so nobly advanced for your benefit, and there will thus remain for you a net return of £65 on your investment of £250 as compared with the paltry £15 which you were previously drawing. "This," says the Securities Investment Company, "is no financial jugglery." Jugglery, indeed! I should myself apply a much stronger term to the propositions put forward in this pamphlet.

An illiterate individual styling himself "The Metropolitan Investment Trust," 4, Birchin-lane, E.C., has been inviting subscriptions for £5 shares in "a guaranteed profit operation in Canadian Pacifics," the profit to be "at least 20 per cent." He observes that the railway "is built upon such a solid foundation that there is no gainsay." No doubt his guarantee is as good as his English.

In consequence of an outburst of circularising activity last week by A. Lawrence and Co., 38, Great St. Helens, E.C., I have received sundry inquiries concerning this firm. It will perhaps be a sufficient answer if I mention that this is a bucket-shop carried on by Lawrence Spiegel, a member of a family notorious in this line of business.

Noting the absence of Hamilton Smith and Co., 80A, Fenchurch-street, E.C., from my 1907 "Cautionary List," though they were given a place in the 1906 edition, a correspondent asks whether I have changed my opinion of these people. Not in the least. The omission was simply due to the fact that they had not come in for any special notice during the past twelve months, but as they are now on the warpath again, I repeat my previous warnings against this bucket-shop.

Two Well-known Reference Books.

The 1907 editions of two well-known works of reference have just come to hand. Now in its twenty-eighth year of publication, Mr. Thomas Skinner's "Directory of Directors" (issued from 77-81, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, price 15s.) has long since become practically indispensable to every one interested in joint stock enterprises. The new volume gives information regarding about 20,600 individuals. The fact that this is only an increase of 600 on the preceding year is, Mr. Skinner points out, evidence of a tendency at the present time to form the boards of new companies (of which 4,748 were registered last year) from men already experienced as directors, rather than from novices. At the same time, it is noteworthy that the average number of directorships held is only about two, though there are some cases of upwards of thirty posts being in one hand, and many men hold seats on the boards of a dozen or more companies.

A younger, but now well-established, work of reference is "The Mining Year Book." By all who are in any way concerned in the mining industry it will be found a valuable publication, giving as it does a complete digest of information relating to more than four thousand companies engaged in mining and kindred businesses throughout the world. A feature of this work is that the companies are given in alphabetical order, so that no index is necessary, nor does one need to know what group a particular concern belongs to in order to facilitate ready reference. Sketch maps of the principal mining fields, particulars of production and dividends, and analyses of accounts, form only part of the book; there are also directories of mining directors, secretaries, mining engineers, and metallurgists, and a record of liquidations and dissolutions during recent years. Mr. J. W. Broomhead contributes an instructive survey of mining developments in the past year. The "Mining Year Book" is edited by Mr. A. N. Jackman, and published by the Financial Times, Ltd., at 15s. net.

Land Mortgage Bonds.

Baron Julius von Madarassy-Beck, the managing director of one of the principal Land Mortgage Banks in Hungary, contributes to the new number of the Financial Review of Reviews an interesting description of the method of investment which is afforded by the bond issues of those institutions. This is a type of security which, by reason of its stability, is very popular in Austria and other countries on the Continent; according to the Baron, the bonds of his bank have not moved so much as 7 per cent. in value during the past ten years. The operations of the land mortgage banks in Hungary are, of course, based upon a system of land tenure and proprietorship totally different to that prevailing in England.

Insurance Notes—Life Policies and Loans—Surrender Values—A Good Investment—House-Purchase and Life Assurance—Good Schemes and Bad.

Many people seem to have the quaintest sort of ideas about life assurance, especially in connection with loans. I received a letter the other day, in which I was asked to recommend a company that would lend £1,000 on the security of a policy, which the borrower would kindly take out in consideration of the loan. He evidently thought this was quite an ordinary kind of transaction for an insurance company, and did not think it necessary for the insurance company to have any security for such a loan. Of course, a life office cannot lend money on the security of a policy until the policy has acquired a certain amount of value through premiums having been paid for some years. After a policy has been in force for some time a company will lend nearly the whole amount of the surrender value, charging interest on the loan at 5, 4½, or perhaps 4 per cent. It takes some years, however, before its surrender value amounts to much more than about 40 per cent. of the total premiums that have been paid.

People sometimes wonder how it is that an insurance company cannot behave like a savings bank and repay a policy-holder at any time he chooses the entire amount he has paid in premiums, perhaps with a little interest as well. I have explained before, but it cannot well be explained too often, that the chance of receiving the full sum assured, say £1,000, after having paid only one or two premiums, perhaps of £35 each, is strictly akin to fire insurance protection, where a man may pay for years without having a fire, and yet he knows that the protection has been well worth the cost. To use another illustration, it is similar to the tickets in a fair lottery, which are worth their price, even though in the end they fail to win a prize. This protection which is afforded by life assurance—this chance of one's estate receiving a very large sum in return for a small payment—is not only of definite value to the individual policy-holder, but obviously involves a considerable cost to the insurance company. The chance of dying within a year increases as we grow older, and when we take a policy which calls for a uniform annual premium throughout life, we are paying rather more than the cost of the insurance protection during the early years of assurance, in order that we may pay less than the cost of assurance protection during the later years. This excess which we pay at first is accumulated by the insurance company in order that funds may be available to meet claims when they arise. This reserve, together with the cash value of bonuses added to the sum assured, is all that a company can possibly give for surrender, and, in fact, for various reasons it is not possible to give quite the full amount of the reserve.

In what I have said above I have principally had in mind policies which are subject to the payment of premiums throughout the whole of life, but when a policy is effected by the payment of a single premium the companies will generally lend at any time 95 per cent. of the amount paid as premium, and after a few years the amount that can be borrowed, or the sum for which the policy can be surrendered, exceeds the amount originally paid; this makes policies taken out by a single payment an extremely satisfactory form of investment. Thus a man aged thirty, in return for a single payment of £350, can be certain, whenever he dies, that the sum of £1,000 will be paid to his estate. He can at any moment borrow £332, and, after a very short time, he can borrow more than he has paid in. Reckoning compound interest at 3 per cent. per annum, it would be thirty-six years before £350 accumulated to £1,000, and thirty-six years is about the average duration of life after age thirty. Hence the man has a perfectly secure investment at a fair rate of interest, always available for realisation, and providing the chance of yielding to his estate a vast deal more than the capital invested in the event of his premature death.

It will thus be seen that while under single premium policies the conditions in regard to surrender value are considerably more advantageous than most people are probably aware of, the conditions as to loans upon annual premium policies are, from the very nature of life assurance business, of a less liberal character than persons unacquainted with the subject think they ought to be. This latter point leads me to a subject about which I hear a good deal from various correspondents. I mean house-purchase systems in connection with life assurance, which are vigorously pushed among the better-class workmen, small shopkeepers, clerks, and the like. I have nothing but praise for the combination of house purchase and life assurance, when the transaction is carried out on sound lines with a good life office, and there is no reason whatever why the well-to-do, as well as the merely thrifty, should not avail themselves of this combination. If a man wants to buy a house for £1,000, and can provide, say, £300 himself, he can borrow £700 from a life office at, perhaps, 4½ per cent., and—assuming his age to be thirty-five—can take a policy for £700 at a premium of £23 10s. a year, under which the sum assured is payable at the end of thirty years, or at death if previous. If we ignore the interest on the £300 which he found himself, his outlay is £31 10s. a year for interest, and £23 10s. a year for the premium, making a total payment of £55 a year. In addition to this, he has the usual landlord's liabilities for repairs, etc., and for ground rent if it is leasehold property. This particular policy participates in bonuses, which would amount to £420 at the end of thirty years, so that if he lived to be sixty-five the house would become his own property without any further payments, and he would have £420 in cash, which would more than replace the £300 which he originally provided for the difference between the purchase price and the amount of the mortgage. An arrangement of this kind has the advantage that the insurance company will undertake not to call in the mortgage so long as the interest is paid and the policy kept in force. If, after some few years, the policy-holder wishes to do so, he can borrow on the security of his policy, which is practically equivalent to increasing the amount of the mortgage.

Romano's Restaurant, Strand.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's—I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire, and this opinion is evidently shared by many, for the restaurant was packed, as it deserves to be."

The difficulty with many people in carrying out such a transaction as this is to provide the difference between the purchase price and the amount that can be borrowed on mortgage; this, however, can be overcome in the course of time. If a man took out such a policy as I have spoken of at age thirty-five, it would in the course of twelve or fifteen years acquire a surrender value sufficient to provide the difference between the purchase price and the mortgage. On the security of the property and the policy the company would lend the full value of the house. For fifteen years the man would have to pay the premium on the policy in addition to his rent, the policy being an excellent and probably necessary investment in any case. For the next fifteen years, instead of paying rent, he would have to pay £31 10s. for interest on the mortgage, and £23 10s. for the premium on the policy, in addition to the usual landlord's payments. At the end of thirty years in all the house would become his own unencumbered property, while if he died within the second fifteen-year period his estate would come into the property with a substantial sum in cash in addition, and if he died within the first fifteen years his estate would receive £700 assured under the policy, together with bonuses of £14 for each year the policy had been in force.

Such an arrangement as this is altogether excellent, but it is not the kind of thing that most of the house-purchase companies do. They commonly promise a vast deal more than it is possible to accomplish, and perform a vast deal more than it is perfectly feasible to do in a first-class life office. I have had a long letter from a correspondent, who has had some dealings with one of these companies, and who, after paying for some years, applied for an advance to enable him to purchase the house, his expectations being in accordance with the company's prospectus. It is almost needless to say that they were not realised. This is typical of what usually happens with these companies, and if anybody wishes to know the facts about them they cannot do better than refer to what I said on the subject in Truth for August 11 and 18, 1904. In the time that has elapsed since then I have had many opportunities of seeing how well-founded my adverse criticisms were.

New Issue.

The following prospectus is published:—

The British Columbia Electric Railway Company, Ltd., invites subscriptions for £500,000 Four and a Quarter per Cent. Perpetual Consolidated Debenture stock at the price of 98 per cent. This is an English limited company, incorporated in 1897, which carries on a well-established electric railway, lighting, and power business in the cities of Vancouver, North Vancouver, New Westminster, Steveston, Victoria, and surrounding districts in British Columbia. The company also controls the whole of the capital of the Vancouver and Victoria Gas Companies, which have a remunerative business. The present issue is required to meet the necessities of the company's expanding business, more particularly in connection with the enlargement of the capacity of the hydraulic electric plant and the construction and equipment of further railways. For the last three years the company has paid a dividend of six per cent. on its deferred ordinary stock. The subscription list closes to-morrow.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Railways.

Why Not.—The stock is sound enough, but if you are anxious not to miss securing the profit, you might realise and exchange into, say, the new Five per Cent. Debentures of the Argentine Great Western Railway, which are offered at 102, and are called 4 premiums on the price of issue. Orient.—1. The bonds cannot be called safe, seeing that the line is not yet built. I can only say the prospect appears to be good. 2, 3, and 4. I will inquire about the outlook for the Ordinary shareholders is a very poor one, and I should be inclined to sell.

Mines.

Azore.—It is impossible to estimate the lives of such mines. No. 1 appear a fair speculation, but I see little attraction in No. 2 at present. Dissatisfied.—Mount Molloys should have some recovery, but there appears little prospect of much improvement in the others within the period mentioned. Mikado.—1. I have not a very high opinion of these, and if you can see a profit, take it. 2. Hopeful holdings for improvement when the market becomes more active. 3. Obviously, your question is barred by my rule. Norval.—A pure speculation, and not a very promising one. J. W. H.—The highest price was, I believe, 1⅞. J.—A fair speculation. Islay.—There is little prospect of a recovery in the near future to the prices you paid, but you should be able to realise to rather better advantage than at present, by waiting. J. F.—Taking the new shares seems a fair speculation. Emerald.—The shares dealt in are fully paid, and are a fair speculation. Vec.—No mining share can be regarded as a safe investment, but as a speculation those you name are a fair holding. Apotheker.—I am unable to give you the desired information. Hold 4 and 5, but you might as well dispose of the others with a view to employing the money in a more promising selection. Delphin, Dublin.—As the London Secretary suggests, you must await the report of the meeting for information as to the directors' policy. You may as well keep the shares in hope of improvement when the market becomes more active.

Mixed Securities.

Slap.—1. I have not a high opinion of its prospects. Besides the arrangement with regard to the deferred shares is preposterously inequitable. 2. Yes. 3. The mine has not been doing well of late, and you could make a better selection in the same market. 4. A very speculative share, and one on which you should be content to secure a small profit. Bello Squardo, Florence.—1. I should give the preference to the Four per Cent. Debentures of the Mexican Central Securities Company. 2. As a holder you are legally liable for the calls, and forfeiture of your shares would not release you from the liability. 3 and 4. I see little attraction in taking up the shares. 5. No. Navigator.—You might transfer portion of the money to Grand Trunk Second Preference, Buenos Ayres Western Railway new Four and a Half per Cent. Preference and Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series). A. D.—1. I do not make such recommendations; see my rules. 2. I see no particular attraction in either. Grand Trunk Third Preference, Argentine Great Western new Five per Cent. Debentures, and United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage Bonds would be more suitable. Objector.—1. I think it would be a pity to part with any of the stocks in your list. The security is excellent, and prices have merely been depressed by the dearness of money, which has affected all investment stocks. 2. Grand Trunk Pacific new Four per Cent. Bonds, City of Bloemfontein New Four per Cent. Stock, and Buenos Ayres Western Railway new Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, should suit your purpose. Scorpion.—1. My advice would be to exchange, as you suggest, into Thirds. See this week's comments. 2. The bank shares are a high-class investment, and I do not advise selling, especially at a loss. Hatton House.—1. The bonds are a dangerous holding, and unless you are prepared to face the possibility of a further fall, better clear out. 2. For a long shot these bonds may turn out all right. The country will probably find out in time that honesty is the best policy. Don Aber.—Mather and Platt, Dick Kerrs, and Pearson and Knowles might be held. 4 and 5 might be sold, and the proceeds put into something with greater promise. 6. There is no reason to advise an immediate sale, but you should watch developments. See my notes a few weeks back. Wales.—1. I think the railway stock should be held for a recovery. 2. The mine you mention has no connection with the Proprietary. The shares seem worth holding. 3. Hold for a recovery. Cariad.—Your list is a good one, and I see no objection to spreading the money just as suggested. F. C. C.—1. The recent fall has been out of all proportion to the amount of stock offered, and you might keep both stocks for, at any rate, a partial recovery. The conditions affecting the companies—as distinct from external market conditions—are brighter than for some years, and it was upon intrinsic merits that my previous advice was based. 2. Hold for the present. G. P.—1 and 2. Both sound investments, and should be held. 3. You might keep them for the present. Michus.—1. A purchase would be likely to turn out well eventually. 2. When commercial conditions in South Africa improve, the company might benefit. 3. There is nothing left to go for at the moment, the dividend resumption anticipations being realised, and they might go lower before they go up. 4. Speculatively I consider Humbers attractive. Watch your market. Hypatia.—1. I have a very poor opinion of the shares.—2. They could be improved upon. 3. Doubtful. 4. They are very attractive, in view of the strength of the metal. 5. If the preference capital is appreciably augmented, the ordinary will naturally suffer. Dublin Reader.—1. Unless developments improve, a decline in the price seems more likely. 2 and 3. I know of no reason for anticipating an advance—certainly not in the latter. Jaylee.—Of their class, 1, 2, and 3 are fairly good. There is, of course, the threatened legislation to consider, but I would hold. 4 and 5 are fair holdings for a moderate profit in a buoyant market. Shamrock.—There is no reason to recommend an immediate sale of Nos. 1, 2, and 3; but they are speculative, and you should watch developmsnts. Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 make very fair holdings for investment. 9. This is not altogether hopeless. 10. Might be sold on any temporary recovery. 11. With any recovery in Kaffirs they might go higher, especially if conditions in the country permanently improve. 12. These may also improve. Francisco the First.—With any improvement in the condition of affairs in the country the company would be one of the first to benefit, and I think you might hold. 2. Yes. Bottom Dog.—1. In the event of some recovery, better cut your loss. 2. Hold the preference in view of the guarantee. Psyche.—1. The second, if you want to sell. 2. Hold. 3. It would be a good exchange. 4. Too dear now. 5. I would select Imperial Tobacco pref. Ajax.—1. Johannesburg Fours, Grand Trunk Pacific New Fours, Central London Railway Four per Cent. Preferred, Buenos Ayres and Rosario Railway Six per Cent. Central Debentures 1979, San Paulo Railway Five and a Half per Cent. Permanent Debentures, City and West End Props. First Mortgage Debentures, and English Sewing Cotton First Mortgage Debenture stock. 2. The society is in a sound condition. Investigation.—1 and 3. I know nothing of either of these concerns. 2. Quite good. 4 and 5. Both attractive investments. 6. Fairly promising. W. D. H.—1. A good investment. 2-4. No recent information, but it seems to be in a more or less hopeless position. 5-7. These lines are under the supervision of Chancery, and in the absence of reports or quotations for the stocks it is impossible to advise. 8. Might as well be held for the present. 9. The line is doing very well, and as a speculative investment the shares are worth holding. 10. Quite satisfactory. 11. A first-class investment. Bath.—They would make a tolerably attractive purchase. The reserve, if any, is small. The undertaking might be municipalised in 1936. Collbran.—As the big contracts are nearing completion, the shares are naturally drooping. If other important contracts are secured they might respond to a slight extent. Capella.—The Tram share is attractive, but Allsop debentures are best left alone. Senoj.—1. I doubt very much whether there is any such book. 2. A "silent" company, and in the absence of reports, I cannot express any opinion on its shares. Melton.—In every instance existing prices are lower than when you bought, but you might, I think, hang on, all being fair commercial holdings. Star.—There is no preference capital beyond the guaranteed stock, redeemable in 1914. Ordinary shares, £3½ paid out of £6⅔, stand at 10½, and would give about 3½ per cent. For a long shot they are attractive. S., Sussex.—The loss would be great, but it might be best in the long run to face it now, and put the proceeds into something more promising, with a view to recouping yourself. 2. A gamble. Claims.—They might be held. Inter Nos.—1. The Grand Trunk of Canada is the parent line, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is now under construction, being built under the auspices of the older company, assisted by the Canadian Government. 2. The bonds I referred to were those of the National of Mexico. I am not familiar with the other concern you name. 3. I would suggest the new Four per Cent. Debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific. 4. The stocks you mention will shortly be redeemed at par. They are therefore unsuitable. Souka.—1. No. 2. The directors' report is due, and pending its issue it would seem inadvisable to buy more. It is impossible to estimate the life of the mine. 3. You had better consult your solicitor.

Insurance.

E. P., Reading. — I advise you not to take up one of this company's bonds; see last paragraph in my insurance notes this week. Poissure.—The Central Insurance Company. Botafogo.—1. The institution is one of the best in existence. 2. The endowment assurance policy is quite good, and, while it will not yield 5 per cent. if you live to fifty, your estate would receive much more than this in the event of your premature death. This protection is well worth buying.

Miscellaneous.

Athenæum.—I have frequently published warnings against the Charles Coventry and Co. bucket-shop. Scotia.—No; the Securities Investment Co is a concern of the bucket-shop class. Anxious.—A sound industrial investment. It is a combination of firms engaged in what is known as the Bradford piece-dyeing trade. Lex loci.—1. I cannot advise you as to the safety of this institution. 2. Not in my opinion. 3. Yes. Boots.—No. Rica.—If you wish to sue Cunliffe, Russell and Co for the return of your money, I will give you the name of a solicitor in Paris. Apple Blossom.—I have had no reason for criticising them; but see rule 8. Languedoc, Scrutator, J. T., Colne, and Cava Via.—See preceding answer. Medicus, Armagh.—Read my "Letter Box" rules. A. W. M., Punjab.—It is a gamble rather than an investment, and not a very attractive one. Do not deal with any advertising firms, but if you want to buy the bonds apply to the Crédit Lyonnais or Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. Constant Reader.—You did not give your name and address. St. Leonards.—The society is in a sound condition. G. H. L., Sohag.—Will make inquiries. P. A. W., Cambus, Kent, and Glasgow.—Read my answer to "A. W. M." I strongly advise you to leave such bonds alone. The International Securities Syndicate charges—as a London magistrate lately pointed out—most exorbitant prices; it is a concern of the bucket-shop class. E. H., Newry.—I am afraid the annoyance cannot be stopped. Notts.—1. Not very attractive. 2. No immediate prospect of it. Cartor.—1. It is not a form of investment at all, but a kind of speculation that is by no means to be recommended, unless the operator has made it a subject of careful study. 2. This question is really answered by the previous reply. I would, however, suggest your reading this week's article on Trunks. 3. No; a bucket-shop. E. R. C. N.—The connection is obvious, but I do not agree that there must consequently be "something wrong."

Hudson's Bay Spurt—'Bus Companies' Troubles—Electric Lighting Companies and the L.C.C.—Lyons Strong—Breweries Still Depressed.

The miscellaneous market, as a whole, has again pursued a humdrum course, unrelieved by any particularly striking development, and uncheered by any sign of that general expansion of business which has so long been awaited. Some revival of activity occurred in Hudson's Bays, which were put up to 118½ on the reports of a railway extension project which is expected to be beneficial to the company, but the upward movement was soon checked, and at the end of the week the price had relapsed to 116½. For a long time past it has seemed to me that these shares are a gamble which speculators of moderate means should avoid. Anglo-A, another favourite gamble, has fluctuated considerably, but after it had dropped below 20 some support was forthcoming, and at 21½ it finished ¼ better on the week. The reports both of the London General Omnibus Company and the London Road Car Company bring out very forcibly the difficulties with which they have been confronted through the introduction of motor traction. The London General, as was announced a week or two back, is paying a dividend of 5 per cent. on its ordinary capital, but in order to do this, £15,000 has to be taken from the reserve fund, and from the report issued last week it appears that the profit on the working for the half-year was only £1,450. The Road Car Company passes the dividend on its ordinary shares for the first time in upwards of twenty years. In reality, however, the figures in its report are not so unsatisfactory as those of the older company, and the Road Car directors have certainly adopted a more judicious policy by strengthening instead of diminishing the reserve funds. The Associated Omnibus Company has also passed its dividend, and at the meeting the other day the chairman made some strong but perfectly justifiable remarks on the lack of prudence which has marked the introduction of the motor 'bus. Inefficient and unsuitable vehicles have been recklessly rushed on to the streets only to be taken off again, and competition in the cheapening of fares has been carried to ruinous lengths. For the old 'bus companies the period of transition from horse to motor traction was bound to be an exceedingly trying one. It is noteworthy, moreover, that only one or two out of ten or a dozen companies formed to run motor 'buses have yet paid any dividend, and no trustworthy information as to the earning capacity of the new vehicles when a proper allowance is made for depreciation is yet forthcoming, so that the outlook for people financially interested in such undertakings is anything but clear. The shareholders in the London United Electric Tramways (1901), are in a more fortunate position. It is true that the dividend on the ordinary shares is only 3 per cent., but the report shows that the company has been doing better than before, and a further improvement may be anticipated with the opening of the Wimbledon, Merton, and Tooting extensions two or three months hence. At the current quotation the five per cent. preference shares of this company give a return of about 6 per cent.

It is evident from the reports that are appearing that the past year was an unfavourable one for the London electric lighting companies. In several cases an increase of business has been accompanied by a diminution of profits, due partly to some reductions in the charge to consumers of electricity for lighting, and partly to the growing use of current for power purposes, the latter customers having, of course, to be supplied at a lower rate than the former. The result of the elections on Saturday puts an end to the proposed electricity supply scheme of the London County Council, but it does not by any means dispose of the question of the establishment of a separate bulk supply undertaking which would be equally detrimental to the existing companies. It is understood that the latter are uniting in the promotion of a Bill to enable them to deal with the matter themselves, but it is not in the least degree likely that this measure will be passed by Parliament. Among catering shares Lyons have advanced to 6⅛ on the announcement that this enterprising company have secured the contract for the Franco-British Exhibition which is to be held at Shepherd's Bush next year. The exhibition is expected to be the biggest thing of the kind that has been witnessed in London for a great many years, and the contract is the most important one that J. Lyons and Co. have yet undertaken. Coupled with the Dublin Exhibition contract, it makes the prospects of the company exceedingly bright and will warrant a still further rise in the shares. In Brewery securities no improvement whatever is discernible, and the existing depression is, indeed, certain to continue in view of the threatened legislation. VIGILANT.

QUEER STORY.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF RICHARD SMETHWICK.

THE sudden and mysterious disappearance of Richard Smethwick on that eventful Friday afternoon in the early part of December, 189—, gave rise to considerable consternation in his family, and to any amount of speculation, mostly scandalous, among the employees at his place of business. The circumstance which lent especial point to their scandalous suggestions was the fact that Amelia Brown, a good-looking girl in the "Ribbons and Laces," to whom Smethwick had for some time been noticeably attentive, had neither put in an appearance that Friday morning nor sent any explanation of her absence.

Richard Smethwick was a draper on Ludgate-hill, in a tolerable way of business, employing about twenty hands, and making an annual net profit of about £1,500. But more than half the capital invested in the business had been put in by his wife, who was very well off, and was perhaps rather too fond of reminding her husband that she provided the lion's share of the family income.

They lived in a largish house at Putney, with their three children, and, at the time of which I write, had been married upwards of fifteen years. Until recently, their union had proved happy. But there was no concealing the fact that for the past twelve months Mrs. Smethwick had found reason to complain of her husband's coldness and neglect, with which she had frequently reproached him, thereby causing many unpleasant altercations, and at the time of his disappearance the relations between them were particularly strained.

Richard Smethwick left the shop about half-past three on that Friday afternoon, saying he was going home early, but should be back as usual next morning. There was nothing out of the way in this, and at the time it excited no attention. Indeed, the first intimation received at the shop that Smethwick had not gone home, as he said, was when the manager, who lived on the premises, was rung up on the telephone by Mrs. Smethwick about 10 p.m., inquiring whether her husband was still there. He replied in the negative, informing her that Mr. Smethwick had left business at half-past three and had not returned since.

The result of his answer was to bring Mrs. Smethwick up in her motor from Putney, in which she reached the shop shortly before eleven o'clock. Finding her husband had still not returned, she drove on to his club to see if she could hear anything of him there. Failing to do so, she went back to the shop and telephoned to Putney (it was now nearly midnight) to ascertain whether, in the meantime, he had gone home. The reply was in the negative, and there was nothing for the wife to do but go back to Putney and there await his return. But when nine o'clock next morning came and still no Smethwick, she felt sure something must be wrong (for he had never in his life stayed out all night before without letting her know); so she went up to London and placed the matter in the hands of the City police.

In the course of the day, the latter ascertained, by investigation, that Smethwick, on leaving the shop the previous afternoon, had gone to his bankers in Lombard-street and had there drawn out nearly all the money standing to his credit at the time—viz., £600, mostly in small notes. But here the scent failed. Nor could they discover the slightest trace of his movements after leaving the bank.

It was at this point that the police were apprised of that circumstance which was already a subject of scandalous gossip at the shop—viz., the simultaneous disappearance of Amelia Brown. The girl, who had quitted the shop on Thursday night at closing time, had not been back since, and inquiry at her lodgings showed that she had left suddenly first thing on Friday morning, saying she had been called away into the country, and might not be back for a week or ten days. She had driven off in a cab and had taken a small quantity of luggage with her. This circumstance, coupled with the fact of the marked attentions shown her by Smethwick, and of his having drawn all his ready money from the bank just at that conjuncture, struck the officer in charge of the case as so highly significant, that he did not think it worth while to pursue his investigations.

Assuming—a fairly safe assumption—that Smethwick had eloped with the girl Brown—well, it was very reprehensible, of course, but it was not a matter in which the police could interfere. They had quite enough to do in running criminals to earth. It was no part of their business to track out merely moral delinquents.

You may imagine that Mrs. Smethwick was exceedingly upset when the true inwardness of her husband's disappearance was thus brought home to her. But there was another member of the fair sex who, with less reason perhaps, but still with reason enough, was even more upset. And her grief and rage were aggravated by the fact that her grievance against Smethwick was of such a nature that she could not make it public.

The individual referred to was a girl named Polly Malpas, employed in a flower shop in the City. Smethwick had for some months been carrying on a flirtation with this girl, and had at length fallen so deep under the spell of her attractions (which were undeniable), that he had persuaded her to run away with him, and had arranged with her to meet him at Charing Cross at four o'clock on that memorable Friday afternoon.

Polly went to Charing Cross, with her luggage, to keep the appointment. But her lover never put in an appearance. She waited for him for three hours, then went back to her lodgings in anything but an equable frame of mind. Polly Malpas was a girl of high spirit and hot temper, not at all the sort of young woman to take a slight "lying down," and she was highly incensed with Smethwick for having failed to keep his appointment.

But, in the course of the next day, when it came to her ears that he had actually disappeared with another girl, her fury against the deceiver knew no bounds. She vowed to herself that if she ever caught him, she would make him pay dearly for his treatment of her and, in the meanwhile, took up with another of her numerous admirers, of whom she had at least a dozen in tow. Polly, you see, was a prudent young woman, and in love, as in finance, prudent persons always take care to keep an ample reserve against contingencies.

A week elapsed without anything whatever being heard of Richard Smethwick, and then, he suddenly turned up late one evening at Putney, looking very pale, seedy, and decidedly woe-begone. It is needless to say that he was not received exactly with open arms by his wife, who very naturally refused to have anything to do with him until he could give her some satisfactory explanation of his absence.

He told a remarkable, and, I am bound to admit, a rather lame, story. It appeared (according to his version) that after leaving the bank in Lombard-street——

"And what did you go to the bank for?" interposed his wife, sharply. "But there! I needn't ask. For I have already ascertained that you went to draw out nearly the whole of your effects—£600—in cash and small notes."

Richard Smethwick coloured and looked decidedly confused. He might have known that this discovery was bound to be made by his wife. But none the less, it was dreadfully disconcerting to be suddenly called upon to explain it to her, face to face.

"Yes—that is so, my dear," he stammered, "I had to meet some—some—heavy business accounts——"

"A likely story," she broke in, witheringly. "As if you could not have paid any such business accounts by cheque! However, go on, Richard. I shall be interested to hear the rest of this pretty little fairy-tale," she added, with biting sarcasm.

"I give you my word, Mary, that I shall tell you nothing but the strict truth," he rejoined, in an injured voice.

"After so promising a start, I should think it highly probable," she retorted, even more sarcastically than before. "However, go on, Richard."

"When I left the bank," he said, in an aggrieved and somewhat sulky tone, "I hailed a four-wheeler that happened to be crawling past and got into it. It was then four o'clock and quite dusk. We had not proceeded many yards, when the cab stopped—owing to a block in the traffic, as I supposed—and drew in close to the kerb. Then, before I had time to realise what was happening, the cab door was suddenly opened from outside and two men, closely muffled so that I could not distinguish their features, jumped in. For the moment, I imagined they were under the mistaken impression that the cab was empty. But in this I was soon undeceived. They fell upon me, gagged me before I had time to cry out, and thrust a drugged handkerchief over my mouth and nose. After a few ineffectual struggles, I lost consciousness."

Mrs. Smethwick sniffed, but said nothing.

The unfortunate Richard continued: "When I came to myself, feeling very faint and dizzy, I found myself, entirely undressed, lying in bed in a strange room, with a man in a black mask sitting by the bedside.

"I asked him where I was and what was meant by such treatment of me. He curtly refused to answer my questions, but told me that no harm was intended to my person, as long as I lay still and didn't try to escape (rather a difficult matter, seeing that all my clothes had been removed), or give an alarm. But if I should attempt anything of the kind, he wouldn't answer for the consequences.

"Well, I was kept there in bed, always under strict surveillance, for how long I cannot say. It seemed like months, and I couldn't distinguish between day and night, for the windows of my room were closely shuttered and curtained, and the gas was always burning. But in the course of my imprisonment, I gathered from remarks between the two masked men who alternately kept watch by my bedside, that they were waiting for a reward to be offered, and that, not satisfied with the £600 of which they had already robbed me, they looked to get at least another thousand out of my family by way of ransom.

"At last, after what seemed an interminable period, I was informed that the time had come for my restoration to my friends; that I must submit to be again drugged, and that, in that condition, I should be taken and left in a certain place from which I could easily find my own way home. I protested against the being drugged, but they insisted, and I was not in the position to offer any resistance. So I was again rendered insensible; and when I came to myself, I was alone, in that piece of waste land by the river, not two hundred yards from here. It was quite dark. But I had no difficulty in recognising the locality. And, as soon as I was sufficiently recovered to walk, of course I came straight here."

"Umph! Is that the best account you can give of yourself?" demanded Mrs. Smethwick, with an ominous sniff.

"My dear, if you don't believe me——" he cried indignantly, "I——"

"Well, it is such a probable story, is it not?" she interjected, with a scoffing laugh. "And such things are so exceedingly likely to happen in London in this civilised twentieth century. Drugging, kidnapping, holding to ransom! My dear Richard, if the scene had been laid in Sicily, or Macedonia, it would at least have had an air of plausibility about it. But in England—— Come, you yourself must admit that it sounds a trifle thin."

"It is the truth, any way," he persisted.

"Besides," she went on, not heeding him. "If they were waiting for a reward, it is decidedly odd that they should release you at the end of a week, when no reward had been offered."

"Eh? Did you offer no reward then?" he exclaimed.

"Certainly not, Richard. Was it likely, considering the circumstances under which you disappeared?"

"What do you mean?" he asked, quickly.

"I mean," replied his wife, with cold deliberation, staring him steadily in the eyes. "What have you done with that hussy Amelia Brown?"

"Amelia Brown!" he ejaculated, with a surprise that, if not genuine, was remarkably well assumed. "Amelia Brown? Good Heavens! The girl is nothing to me. Has she disappeared, then? I remember now that she did not come to the shop on that Friday morning. If she has gone off, I am in no way responsible for it, I give you my word."

Mrs. Smethwick laughed a hard, incredulous laugh.

"Come, Richard," she said, "you had better own up and have done with it. Here we have this girl Brown—to whom I understand you have been much too attentive—disappearing on a certain Friday, and all trace of her is lost. On the same Friday you also mysteriously disappear, having just drawn out a large sum in cash from the bank. Can you wonder that I am naturally anxious to know what you have done with your favourite—where you have installed her? As your wife, I have a right to ask the question; and I mean to have it answered, too," she added, with fierce determination.

"I tell you I have no more idea of Brown's whereabouts than the babe unborn. Her disappearance had nothing to do with me."

"That remains to be established by investigation, Richard," answered his wife, frigidly, pursing up her firm lips.

"The more you investigate, the better I shall be pleased," he answered. "For it will only confirm the truth of what I have told you."

"Oh," said Mrs. Smethwick, icily. . . . "Well, perhaps you had better go to bed now, Richard. You looked fagged and done up. I have had the spare room prepared for you these days past, on the chance of your return. We can discuss the position further to-morrow. Now I will wish you good-night."

And she sailed out of the room. Her husband was not sorry for the termination of the interview. He had been in mortal dread, all along, lest she should make some allusion to his projected elopement with Polly Malpas. It was a great relief to him to find that she still knew nothing of that liaison.

Next day he went, as usual, to the shop, and made a point of telling his manager the same story, to account for his mysterious absence, as he had already told his wife. The manager heard the story with many expressions of respectful sympathy. But Smethwick rather gathered from his manner that the fellow all the while had his tongue in his cheek, and this annoyed him the more because he could not well take notice of such veiled incredulity. He determined, however, to seize the first available pretext for dropping heavily on his manager.

In the course of the day, by a strange coincidence, news was received of the missing Amelia Brown, in the shape of an apologetic letter to the head of her department.

From this letter it appeared that the girl had been suddenly telegraphed for to nurse a sick relative at Hastings, and had gone off in such a hurry that she had not had time to communicate with her employers. She had, however, written, explaining matters, immediately after her arrival at Hastings, and had entrusted the letter to the milkman to post. But the milkman appeared to have put the letter in his pocket and forgotten all about it, and she (the writer) had only that moment been made aware of his omission. She wished to apologise most sincerely, and, at the same time, to say that she should not be returning to the shop, as her young man had just had a substantial rise in salary and they had arranged to be married at once.

This story, with its lame excuse about the milkman, was also regarded by the hands at the shop as rather thin, and among themselves they were extremely facetious about it. But the further investigations which Smethwick, for his own sake, insisted upon making, proved the girl's statement to be quite correct, and he was thus cleared of the suspicion of having taken her away and installed her in a bijou residence, which, ever since their simultaneous disappearance, had been universally entertained.

But prior to these further investigations, Richard Smethwick had sought an interview with Polly Malpas. He found Polly in a most resentful and vixenish humour. She laughed his story of being kidnapped to utter scorn, refused to listen to his protestations, and ended by telling him to clear out of the flower-shop at once, unless he wanted his face smacked. Polly was a vulgar girl, and expressed herself with vulgar robustness. Moreover, she was so evidently in earnest that Smethwick, who had no mind for facing the scandal and disgrace of being publicly assaulted by the little termagant, beat a prudent retreat.

During the ten days that intervened between Smethwick's return and the clearing up of the Amelia Brown affair our worthy draper had the deuce of an unpleasant time, both at home and at the shop. His wife's scornful coldness in the one place, and the covert smiles and whisperings of his employees in the other, made his life a perfect misery to him—a misery for which he could not console himself by the reflection of conscious innocence. Since, though it was in a wrong direction that suspicion had fallen upon him, yet he could not deny to himself that suspicion of infidelity to his wife (in intention at any rate) had been but too well deserved. Besides, when all was said and done, he had been unduly and foolishly attentive to his pretty employee.

However, the clearing up of the Brown affair—his projected intrigue with Polly Malpas not coming to light—had the satisfactory result of bringing about his reconciliation with Mrs. Smethwick and also of reinstating his character at the shop. And he vowed to himself that, after the lesson he had had of the unpleasant consequences of amorous scandal, he would never risk compromising himself with any young woman again.

This was not virtue. Virtue did not rule strong in Richard Smethwick. It was just the selfish prudence of a man who, having once burnt his fingers, to his own great discomfort, has no stomach to risk the pain of a second cauterisation.

A week or two later, Mrs. Smethwick and her husband went to dine with the former's brother, who not long previously had taken a house near the Smethwicks at Putney.

No one else was there. It was a little family party of three. After dinner, the host suggested that they should explore his new house.

On entering one of the bedrooms, on the top floor, Richard Smethwick suddenly turned pale and gave vent to a smothered exclamation.

"Great Scott! Why this is the very room where I—I——"

"Just so," smiled his brother-in-law. "The very room where you were incarcerated. And here" (handing him a sealed packet) "is the money of which you were then relieved. I do not know if you would like to count it. But if you do, you will find it perfectly correct——"

"But—but—I say—what the—devil does this mean?" gasped the bewildered draper.

"It means, my dear Richard," struck in his wife, quietly, "that it was necessary to save you from the ruinous step of bolting with that Malpas creature, and also, incidentally, to cure you of being too attentive to your pretty shop assistants. Miss Brown was perfectly willing—for a consideration of £100—to co-operate with us in a way you can easily divine. And my brother, with the help of two intimate friends, did the rest. To put it concisely, you needed protection against yourself; you also needed a lesson that you would remember. And I took care that you should have both."

ART NOTES.

I AM pleased to find that I have hitherto underestimated the business enterprise of some of the artists who make a habit of exhibiting their works at little "one-man" shows. My last week's reflections on the subject have brought me quite a number of letters—most of them from ladies—pointing out my errors, discussing the commercial value of press notices, and incidentally suggesting, with various degrees of subtlety, that I might do worse than notice the exhibitions held by the writers. One of these letters charmed me very much, so that I am tempted to reproduce parts of it, the more so that it is an excellent example of the subtlety to which I refer. It runs: "I have much enjoyed your 'Art Notes' this week in Truth, and especially the way in which you dispose of the 'minor women.' It would interest me much to see how you would dispose of me, and, therefore, I enclose . . ," and so on. Mark the subtle mixture of direct and implicative adulation; the suggestion that my writings are enjoyable; the hint that my criticism would be both instructive and amusing. Can one not imagine the writer laughing in her sleeve (I believe that sleeves are now fashionable) at the thought of the gudgeon gulping down the hook so delicately hidden in the attractive bait? At any rate, the gudgeon swallowed it, and went to see the writer's pictures, and liked them very much, even while he realised that they were largely derivative, and that if a painter named Turner had never lived many of them would never have been painted. I am very much tempted to mention the painter's name, but refrain, lest she should think it unfair of me to take advantage of a personal letter, even though it were not marked "private."

Among my other letters is one which is instructive as showing that the path of the critic is made very smooth indeed nowadays. It encloses a long dissertation—it would take up about three columns of Truth—expressed in the most charming style and excellently printed, upon the exhibits which are to be included in the annual exhibition of the Royal Amateur Art Society which is to be opened to-morrow (Thursday) at Hyde Park House. It is an excellent "annual;" it assists several deserving charities, and altogether deserves everybody's best wishes. But what really warms my heart towards it, is the thoughtful way in which the dissertation not only tells the busy journalist what he may expect to see, but exactly what he ought to think and say about what he does see. Thus he gathers not only that Princess Beatrice contributes a screen embroidered by herself with B's intertwined with Tudor roses, but that it is "in an admirable design"; not only that Princess Louise Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein exhibits enamels, but also that there is much originality in her designs—this, I suppose, refers to the designs of the enamel—and that "the colour is specially translucent and pure." He can learn that the Duchess of Buckingham sends "a striking head," and Captain Fuller Maitland "some very clever water-colours." This is really extremely useful to the critic, who, otherwise, dazzled by the array of august and aristocratic names, might lose his critical faculties altogether and not know what to say about some of the exhibits. I can discern only one possible danger concealed among the roses thus heaped in the critic's path; if things are made too easy for him it may be that some day newspaper proprietors and editors, who are a notoriously unappreciative race, will dispense with his services altogether and invite artists to write their own criticisms upon their own works, to be inserted at usual advertisement rates. And I doubt if either the critics or the artists would like that.

Referring to the prices fetched by paintings in the auction-room, a correspondent professes astonishment that George Morland's paintings should now fetch thousands of pounds, but that he nevertheless died in poverty. As a matter of fact, Morland is scarcely a good example, for his poverty was to a large extent his own fault—he certainly had the opportunity of earning a competency during his lifetime. He had no difficulty in selling all the pictures he cared to paint, but preferred to spend much of his time observing life through the bottom of a tumbler. But, quite apart from the personal equation, it is only natural that when paintings come into the auction-room, a dead dog should be worth more than a live lion. Once an artist is dead, his output of pictures is stopped. Nature forms a trust in them; the supply being limited, prices are bound to rise and to continue rising, and the greater the dead painter, so much the greater will be the disparity between the prices he could command during his lifetime and those fetched posthumously. "It cannot be that the common herd are more enlightened," continues my correspondent, ". . . . for I read in the Daily Graphic that two modern R.A.s' pictures came into Christie's, and they had great difficulty in getting a bid of twenty guineas for them." Surely the comment upon this startling fact is obvious—too obvious, indeed, to need stating.

I have given up so much space to pointing out what I consider defects in various recent picture-shows, that I feel inclined, for a change, to speak of one which I have found absolutely satisfying. It is that of paintings by Henri Le Sidaner, now being held at the Goupil Galleries in Regent-street. Le Sidaner is a very great painter—in his chosen field I know of no living painter who approaches him. He shows only eight pictures, each of them, in its way, a masterpiece. They all treat of Venice, and each of them makes Venice a great deal more convincing than it is in actual fact—to ordinary eyes, at any rate. Take "Le Vieux Palais, Clair de Lune." It epitomises the whole poetry of the Venice of romance—the old palace, standing up pale and mysterious in the moonlight; soft, dark shadows hedging it all about, one gush of lamplight coming from a window—a masterpiece of melting, trembling luminosity. Or, again, the "Musique sur l'Eau, le Soir"—was there ever more convincing artificial light than that which comes from the coloured lanterns around which the gondolas are clustering, or from the lamps along the quay and trembles on the dark waters of the canal? You may look closely at the canvas, and your eyes will still almost refuse to believe that it is not light, but only paint, which deceives them so. I have heard Le Sidaner's work called "trick-painting;" if so, it is among the most convincing trickery that art has produced. There are admirable points about this exhibition, quite apart from the pictures. The very fact that there are only eight of them is an abiding joy. Each has its ample wall-space—it has no need to jostle its neighbours; there is no clashing of colours or harmonies—each can be seen to its very best advantage. You need have no fear of an "Academy headache;" you can give to each the attention it merits, and when you go away, each has its own place in your memory, with no more jostling of or by its neighbour than on the walls themselves. If only every artist would realise the great fact that the less he shows of his work—at a time—the better for it and for him; and what a pleasant trade that of art critic would be!

MUSIC.

THE SAD CASE OF "A REAL SANTA CLAUS."

Readers of the newspapers will recollect a picturesque story which gained wide publicity some few weeks since in which Mr. Albert Spalding, the young American violinist, was represented as having played the part of Santa Claus to a sweet little girl who had written to him to ask the loan of a violin. As communicated to the press by Mr. S. T. Dann, Mr. Spalding's energetic manager, it was a moving narrative in which the circumstances were recounted. This was how it opened:—

A REAL SANTA CLAUS.

How a Musical Genius was Discovered.

In a flat in the West of London lives a happy little girl to-day, who had the ardent wish of her young life granted on Christmas eve, like a good child in a fairy story. Little Nusha—for this is her name—is a charming little lady of thirteen, and bids fair to grow up as beautiful as she is talented. She speaks four languages, paints beautifully for her age, and plays the piano; but her ambition is to become a great violinist. Nusha lives with her widowed mother, a charming cultured lady, who from affluence has been reduced to a small income, but undaunted shows a smiling face to the world, and ekes out her scanty income by giving lessons in languages, she being master of five, and is also a good musician.

Then the writer proceeded to narrate how little Nusha had written to Mr. Spalding to ask him to lend her one of his fiddles, how Albert had been touched by the appeal, and had commissioned his manager to investigate the case, and how in the result Mr. Dann was the bearer of the gratifying news to little Nusha that her wishes were to be realised.

In the graphic language of the official narrative:—

Mr. Dann being satisfied, proceeded with a friend and Mrs. Dann to the flat on Christmas eve. The door, strange to say, was opened by Nusha herself. Mr. Dann said he was the bearer of a letter from Albert Spalding, and the little party was asked into the dining-room to see mamma. Nusha's face was a study, the expression alternating between hope and fear—she could see no violin. Mrs. Dann, seeing the child's emotion, suggested that she should take the letter into another room and read it. She was quickly back, rushing in with a radiant face, saying, "Oh, Mamma! mamma! Isn't he good! He is sending me a violin, and has written me such a lovely letter."

What a happy picture it conjured up? Who could fail to thrill sympathetically at the thought of Albert's goodness and little Nusha's delight? The most hardened reader dropped a furtive tear as he perused the affecting story and rejoiced with little Nusha over her great good fortune. But, alas! for the vanity of human hopes—

> Oft expectation fails, but most oft there
> Where most it promises.

The homely proverb which reminds us of the sempiternal slip lurking 'twixt cup and lip, was destined to be exemplified afresh in the subsequent course of this transaction whose opening was so auspicious. In other words, little Nusha is still awaiting the arrival of her promised violin, and the lively correspondence which lies before me at the moment explains the reason why.

The trouble began, apparently, with Mr. Dann's thoughtlessness in communicating the circumstances to the press without the consent of the parties concerned. This was a Santa Claus, one gathers, with a keen eye to the uses of advertisement, whose first care it was, accordingly, that the public should be made acquainted with his benefactions. Hence the correspondence in question opens with a letter from Mr. Dann to Mrs. King, little Nusha's mother, apologising for his premature disclosure of the facts, and explaining, in effect, that they had leaked out despite his anxious desire to withhold them from the public. Mrs. King is, however, a lady evidently blessed with commendable strength of character, and her reply lacked nothing in respect of its point and directness. Mr. Dann had stated that the matter which had appeared had been based on casual remarks which had been made to a reporter. To which Mrs. King made answer: "I must own that I am not able to follow your explanations. But then, you see, I am not acquainted with the ways of the gentlemen of the press. It seems to me, however, that your Central News gentleman must possess remarkable talents to be able to supply from memory even to a literal copy of a letter." At the same time, she inquired when the promised violin might be expected to arrive. Confiding Mrs. King! Poor little Nusha!

The next development was a visit in person from Mr. Dann, the impression left by which on Mrs. King may be gathered from the following extract from a letter subsequently addressed by her direct to Mr. Albert Spalding:—

Mr. Dann calls yesterday subsequent to his letter of January 7 (anticipating an early arrival of the violin), and practically says that all that was required was the advertisement, that nothing was meant, and that we were foolish to believe anything. "After all," he exclaimed finally, "Nusha had her quid pro quo in receiving a letter from a big violinist and £5." I pointed out to him that it seemed incredible that a present could be tendered in such a spirit, and that if there was any clear ground to think so, the £5 would be returned to-morrow; also that I could not believe that you never intended to give effect to the promises in your gracious letter to Nusha.

Here was a sad state of things! Santa Claus accused of breach of faith and conducting an angry correspondence with his clients! Take the following, for instance, from one of Mr. Dann's subsequent letters to Mrs. King:—

In consequence of receiving your extraordinary letters, Mrs. and Albert Spalding wish me to state that they decline to see Nusha to-day as originally arranged. As I will not advise them on the subject, Albert and Mrs. Spalding have decided to refer the matter to others who will investigate the case before again communicating with you. Having practically ruined your daughter's career with the Spaldings for no obvious reason, it may be a source of gratification to you to know that the violin has arrived, and only your ill-advised letter, containing false statements, has prevented Nusha from receiving it to-day.

Santa Claus was clearly angry, while Mrs. King, in her turn, was much upset.

Mr. Spalding and his mother were kinder, however, and at their request little Nusha was taken by her mother to see them. She played, they expressed their approval, and all seemed to be going well. Unfortunately, this happy state of things was not to last. For Santa Claus was in the background, biding his time, and the harmony was speedily disturbed again. Precisely why Mr. Dann intervened at this stage is not quite clear. It is enough that he did so, however, and, according to Mrs. King, with dire effect. Nusha was sent away, and for a quarter of an hour by the clock that unfortunate lady was called upon to withstand the fury of his invective. Appeal for protection to Mrs. Spalding was vain. Like the Ancient Mariner, Mr. Dann subdued one and all by his glittering eye, and heaped reproaches, more in anger than in sorrow, on Mrs. King's devoted head. The want of delicacy displayed by that lady in positively asking for the delivery of the promised fiddle had evidently angered him inexpressibly. Eventually it was arranged that the whole matter should be submitted to the arbitration of Mr. Spalding, sen. (Albert's father). Mrs. King, still smarting beneath the flail of Mr. Dann's eloquence, staggered from the scene, upborne by Nusha (who is quite a strapping little lassie), and has since been anxiously awaiting the promised award of Spalding père. This was several weeks ago, and up to the moment of writing no communication of this nature has, I understand, been received. Mrs. King has accordingly taken the offensive again, and now demands an apology for the annoyance caused her by the publication of the original story, together with a list of all the papers in which that moving narrative was inserted. To this Mr. Albert Spalding has replied by his secretary that "he quite fails to understand what you are driving at in your letter," and "he desires me to add that possibly it would have been better if the original letter he received from Nusha had been tossed there and then into the waste-paper basket, or still more, that the child had not written any letter at all."

In such melancholy circumstances, what can the mere outsider say? Little, surely, with profit. I am content to give the facts, leaving it to others to extract therefrom such morals as they may.

There have been a good many interesting concerts lately. At the second Philharmonic on Thursday a new symphony by Georges Enesco was introduced, but it is hardly likely to find a permanent place in the society's repertory. De Pachmann was the pianist, and played superbly as usual. The programme of the Queen's Hall symphony concert on Saturday contained no novelties, but proved none the less attractive on this account. Mme. Carreño's playing in Rubinstein's D minor concerto was alone worth going to hear. Another orchestral performance of the week was that given by the recently-formed Kreuz Orchestra, which gives works of the lighter and less familiar school with admirable point and finish. M. Godowsky's rare appearances in London are always events of note, and on Saturday he played with all his wonted brilliance, though in a rather unINTERESTING programme. Comic relief was, however, provided by the antics of M. de Pachmann, whose admiration for Godowsky, whom he once called the Christus of the piano, is of old standing.

Mr. Leonard Borwick has also been heard again, likewise a new pianist (Mr. Nathan Fryer), who is quite a credit to his master, Leschetizky. Mr. Borwick introduced, among other things, some clever transcriptions of his own of Bach organ pieces, which, I notice with surprise, have been received with positive enthusiasm in quarters where such things are usually condemned without mercy. Nay, we are even told that these particular transcriptions are better than the originals, because they bring out details impossible on the organ. Here is heresy indeed. In the way of vocal concerts the record is rather scanty. Of course, there was a large attendance at the London Ballad Concert on Friday, when Mischa Elman appeared, in addition to many vocalists of note, while Signora Estrela Belinfante's recital introduced a new singer of considerable gifts. Mention may also be made under this head of the enjoyable concert given by the Oriana Madrigal Society.

Full of years and honours Sir August Manns passed away last week. Few men have done more for music in this country. But just a little exaggeration has crept into some of the remarks called forth by his regretted death. It is going too far, for instance, to say that Manns was actually the first to give classical orchestral music at cheap rates in this country. As early as 1839 Valentino at "The Crown and Anchor" was offering symphonies to the London shilling public, while the good work which Jullien did in the early 'fifties at his famous Promenade concerts may also be recalled. The suggestion, therefore, that when Manns began his labours at the Palace, London hardly knew what an instrumental concert meant is rather wide of the mark. Even apart from such concerts as those of Jullien, Musard, and others, the Philharmonic concerts had been founded long years previously, while contemporaneously with those given under Manns at the Palace, the New Philharmonic Concerts under Berlioz were also offering first-class fare at very moderate prices. But to recall these facts is not to diminish in any way the credit due to the grand old musician who died last week for his splendid services in the same field.

A paragraph of a familiar type is going the rounds concerning "a famous Strad" which our old friends Messrs. Glendining, of the Argyll Rooms, propose to offer for sale shortly. This, we are told, "is known to connoisseurs and musicians as the Soames Strad," and it is added that "it was bought many years ago by Mr. Soames for a large sum, and has figured prominently in all the records of the maker's life." There is, perhaps, a touch of pardonable exaggeration here. Mr. Soames was an estimable old gentleman, who lived in Great Cumberland Place, but his name was practically unknown in the violin world, and as to his having purchased the instrument "many years ago," I fancy that he cannot have bought it more than ten years since at the outside. This would not matter much if the instrument were really, as stated, one well known to connoisseurs and musicians. In point of fact, it is nothing of the kind, and those concerned in booming it would certainly be hard put to point to any reference to it in any of the authentic records of Stradivari's work. It is a small-sized instrument, and on this account alone it has probably never been used by any player of standing as a solo instrument in public, nor is any such player ever likely to use it, since the volume of tone is necessarily less in the case of such violins. The idea is, doubtless, to run it up in the auction-room to a fancy figure—a process which often has a marvellously stimulating influence on the price subsequently obtained for such instruments from the ingenuous amateur. Cases are not unknown, indeed, in which instruments have been put up and "purchased," with this end in view, by one and the same individual.

In regard to the vexed question of piracy by phonograph, which continues to agitate the breasts of composers and publishers all the world over, a valuable pronouncement has just been made by the United States Senate Committee on Patents in their report on the new Copyright Bill, at present under consideration in America. The point at issue is, of course, whether the proprietors of mechanical instruments, such as gramophones and phonographs, should reproduce compositions without the permission of the owners of the copyright. The committee in question has decided emphatically in the negative. They say:—

> It seems obvious to this committee that if the musical composition is entitled to protection it is not only against the reprinting of a musical score, but against any publication or reproduction of the composer's work. The musical composer's work is meant to be uttered in sound, and if science has discovered a method of reproducing that sound, thus taking possession of the very soul and essence of a musical composer's work without the medium of actual printing, the musical composer is entitled to protection against this new and more complete form of appropriation quite as much as he is entitled to protection from a stage performance of his opera or orchestral performance of his symphony.

The case could hardly be put more cogently.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Am I too late in recommending to you Professor Clerici's "A Queen of Indiscretions" (1), translated by Mr. Chapman and furnished by him with an admirable and necessary introduction? Necessary, I say, since it supplies a just counterpoise to Professor Clerici's assumption that his Queen of Indiscretions was more than indiscreet. When you have read and weighed all that Mr. Chapman has to say of the unfortunate lady in the introduction, and all that the Professor has brought against her in the volume, you will, I think, give her the benefit of the doubt, or at very least add to your verdict of guilty a recommendation to mercy, because of circumstances of extraordinary extenuation. The juries of her own day which tried her—and she was tried, I might say, not in the Houses of Lords and Commons only, but in every house in the three Kingdoms—were all deeply prejudiced politically, either on one side or the other. Indeed, it was not possible to know this impolitic and impulsive woman without being deeply prejudiced either for or against her. Sir John Page Wood assured Grantley Berkeley that "there never was a more attractive and alluring person in manner than Queen Caroline. She had an excellent temper and most benevolent disposition. Her fault was a contempt for the world's opinion, when she was unconscious of wrong-doing." On the other hand, Captain Gronow assures you that "the Princess of Wales was one of the most unattractive and almost repulsive women for an elegant-minded man that could well have been found amongst German royalty." A clue to these conflicting impressions, and not to these conflicting impressions only, but also to the opposing views of Mr. Chapman and of the Professor, and of the Court, and of the country—while her trial was proceeding—seems to me to be suggested by the following significant anecdote narrated by Grantley Berkeley. When Caroline found amongst her guests at dinner at Brandenburg House a nobleman whom she knew to be of the Prince's faction, she had two decanters filled with cold tea, and nearly emptied both during the meal. After the break-up of the party, she remarked to one of her own ladies, "Now dat man vill go back to de Prince and tell him dat I had finished de best part of two bottles for dinner, and dat I vas qvite drunk." Caroline took a perverse pleasure in shocking Mrs. Grundy, especially when that old busybody was venomously on the look-out for such offences. Again, the Queen was as gross and great a hoyden as Wycherley's "Country Wife." She loathed boredom—and is there any boredom like that of a Court? Of a bore she remarked: "Mein Gott! Dat is de dullest person Gott Almighty ever did born!" She took, therefore, a threefold delight in kicking over the traces, through her horror of boredom, her love of pleasure, and her joy in appalling Mrs. Grundy. When, then, this elderly lady fell in love with her handsome, young Italian valet—a kind of infatuation from which old ladies, even when they are queens, are not exempt—she allowed herself and him scandalous liberties. Whether these liberties were as scandalous as the Italian witnesses—most of them evidently suborned—tried to make out, is another question. On the other hand, there can be no question that if ever a wretched woman in this world was forced on ill courses by ill-usage, that woman was Queen Caroline. On her arrival upon our shores, Lady Jersey, her bridegroom's mistress, was sent to meet and escort her, and also to pump and betray all her secrets—and this with the connivance of "the good Queen Charlotte!" Because her husband's niece, in place of her own, was chosen as the bride of her son, "the good Queen" pursued the wretched Caroline from first to last with all the mean malignity of a vindictive woman. As for the First Gentleman in Europe's treatment of his wife, from first to last it was brutal and even bestial. At his first introduction to his bride he could support the sight of her only with the help of brandy, and only with its help could he get through the marriage service. Thenceforward there was no insult or indignity which he or his mother could heap upon her that they failed to subject her to. Nor did she escape persecution when she flattered herself that she was free to disport herself as she pleased in Italy. Her every move and movement was dogged by the Prince's spies, who reported it duly, no doubt exaggerating—when they did not invent—much that they reported. Of course, Caroline, in the exuberance of her delight at her emancipation from the house of bondage, did all kinds of compromising things, for she was as silly as she was impulsive. How inexpressibly silly she could be, when left to her own devices, is suggested by her establishment, in commemoration of her visit to Jerusalem, of the Order of St. Caroline, whose motto was that of the Garter, and whose Grand Master was her ex-valet, Bartholomew Pergami, to be succeeded by "his children—males as well as females—who were to have the honour to wear the same order from generation to generation for ever." However, Professor Clerici has taken this poor queen quite seriously, and has been at the pains to compile from hitherto unpublished documents, both public and private, an extraordinarily detailed, minute, and interesting record of her sojourn in Italy. I think you will be deeply interested in the very pretty love story of "Amalia" (2) and her German Prince, neither of whom sees the other before marriage, nor cares much for each other for some time after. Each, however, comes to discover unsuspected virtues in the other, while the common dangers to which they are exposed, through the many plots of assassination hatched by their turbulent subjects, naturally draw them nearer together. The development of Amalia's motherly and protective love for her consort into worshipping conjugal devotion is charmingly described. But, indeed, the whole story is charming. I hope Mrs. Summers's idea or ideal of "A Man's Love" (3) is neither that of the frenziedly jealous Ross Barrington, nor that of the dastardly scoundrel, Selden Marshall. I suppose there are such gratuitous scoundrels as Selden Marshall and such gratuitous vipers as Lilia, the heroine's sister; but they are too rare, fortunately, to be probable in a novel. On the other hand, the heroine, her sister-in-law, and the two Desmonds indemnify you at once by their naturalness and by their amiability for all that is improbable and unpleasant in the other characters. Yet more charming is the sprightly, gifted, but ill-mated heroine of Mr. Keighley Snowden's "Kate Bannister" (4). Her forced marriage to the villain is forced to unnaturalness, while the villain's death — foreseen in a dream by her — is somewhat melodramatic, but the relations between the two women he married, and betrayed through marriage, are excellently described, and yet more effective are the love passages between Kate and Dick Herrick. An Indian connection of mine, now in high position in that Empire, scored off a globe-trotter, who expressed to him his indignation at sight of the following notice posted up in a Dak bungalow: "You are requested to refrain from beating the native servants." "Why," retorted my friend, "that notice is put up for those who use Dak bungalows—for you, the globe-trotters, not for us, the residents." If every globe-trotter took with him upon his visit to India Mr. Reynolds-Ball's really admirable handbook, "The Tourist's India" (5), such notices would be superfluous. I took the volume up under the impression that it was a mere guide-book, but found it to my surprise and pleasure incomparably more interesting and instructive than any guide-book. Not the least of its merits is that I have just suggested to you—its sympathy with the natives. The ordinary Englishman, resident or globe-trotter, is the reverse of sympathetic with the natives of any country, east or west, with the result—at least in India—that he is regarded, says Mr. Reynolds-Ball, as Temple, when Master of Rugby, was regarded by his boys—"as a beast, but a just beast." "The Tourist's India," while being packed like a globe-trotter's portmanteau—everything put in the smallest possible space in the neatest possible way—is saved from the dryness that usually goes with such terseness by numberless illustrative stories excellently told.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Mr. P. H. Ditchfield has written a most entertaining volume on "The Parish Clerk" (Methuen and Co., 7s. 6d. net). He gives an instructive sketch of the history of this ancient office, the duties of the clerk, his ecclesiastical status and so forth, but to the general reader, at least, the book will be chiefly welcome on account of its rich store of diverting anecdotes. Of the eccentricities of the parish clerk, his droll mis-readings, and his exalted ideas of the importance of his office, Mr. Ditchfield has, indeed, an endless supply of good stories. One of the best relates how a Lancashire clergyman preached an unconscionably long sermon at a week-day service in order that the parish clerk might be prevented from going to a local race meeting. The clerk had his revenge. After the sermon he gave out "the 'undred and nineteenth Psalm from yend to yend," adding, "he's preached all day and we'll sing all neet." The uncertainty of a clerk with reference to his position in modern days was thus explained by one worthy: "I hardly know what I be. First vicar, he called me clerk; then another came and he called me virgin (verger); the last vicar said I were Christian (sacristan), and now I be clerk again."

Mr. George Morley, who is known as the author of several works on the Shakespeare country, has taken the Warwickshire greenwood as the subject for his first effort in fiction—"A Bunch of Blue Ribbons," which Messrs. Alston Rivers announce for publication immediately. The same firm are also issuing a novel entitled "The Artistic Temperament," by Jane Wardle.

It is in autumn fiction in the daily papers that the sea serpent usually figures. Now, however, it is announced that the monster will make an appearance in a novel by Mr. James Barr, entitled "Witchery of the Serpent," which Messrs. Gay and Bird will publish.

On Friday next Messrs. Harper and Brothers will have ready a new volume by Archibald R. Colquhoun and Ethel Colquhoun entitled "The Whirlpool of Europe: Austria-Hungary and the Hapsburgs." It is a comprehensive account of that great conglomerate of nationalities, and the book will have an abundance of illustrations.

Mr. John Long is bringing out a political novel entitled "The Sweets of Office," from the pen of Violet Tweedale, which, it is predicted, will be read with equal enjoyment by people of all shades of political opinion. It is described as a merciless exposure of political insincerity, one of the characters being an ambitious young member of the Cabinet who professes Radicalism in order to retain office, though at heart he is a Tory. Another novel which Mr. Long announces is "A Butterfly," by the Baroness von Goldäcker, a new writer.

Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's new book, "Poison Island," which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. are publishing this week, is a story of the year 1813, dealing with the search for a hidden treasure, and packed with thrilling adventures. It is certain, therefore, to delight a host of "Q's" most ardent admirers.

Sir Charles Eliot's "Letters from the Far East," and a fourth series of Sir Herbert Maxwell's charming "Memories of the Months," are among Mr. Edward Arnold's announcements of books to be published immediately.

Mr. W. H. Craig's "Life of Lord Chesterfield," published this week by Mr. John Lane, does not dwell on the more notorious aspects of the Earl's character, but rather seeks to bring into prominence "those rarer and higher qualities which distinguished him as a valuable public servant, whose zeal, energy, political foresight, incorruptibility, and dexterity have placed England under an obligation to him which she is sometimes liable to forget." The volume has a photogravure portrait and numerous other illustrations.

Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's new book, "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic," will be published by Messrs. Longmans in April. It is based upon a minute study of the manuscript and printed authorities made available of recent years by the work of Italian professors and librarians, and upon visits paid to the actual scenes of the events described.

The 1907 edition of Mr. Robert Donald's "Municipal Year Book" has just been published by Edward Lloyd, Ltd., Salisbury-square, price 3s. 6d. net. It contains some new matter, and all the old features, with the facts and figures brought up to date, which have so firmly established the reputation of the volume as an indispensable work of reference for every one interested in municipal administration throughout the country.

I find that through an oversight I omitted to notice the appearance some weeks ago of the 1907 edition of "Thoms's Official Directory," published at 87, Abbey-street, Dublin, price 21s. It is, of course, primarily an Irish directory, but at the same time it contains a mass of official and statistical information, including some special features of its own, which make it useful as a general work of reference.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Ours is not regarded as a romantic nation. Yet what other country has ever had the idea of providing honeymoon railway carriages for happy couples? The Midland Railway leads the way with this happy thought, and will probably reap the benefit in being preferred to all other railways for the start into "that new world that is the old."

Apropos! In Hachette, the businesslike and invaluable French almanac, there is given a list of things to be noted throughout the year. Not the prices paid for coal, nor the date of changing servants. Not at all! Nothing so depressing. Here are some of the items which I find perfectly charming—just poetic enough, and not too poetic. The things to which dates are to be appended include: The first blackbird's song; found the first violet; arrival of the swallows; the chestnut trees in bloom; first dined by daylight; heard the cuckoo for the first time; the lawn mowed for the first time; the cherry trees in flower, and so on; and this in the midst of any amount of learning, science, art, details of commerce, cookery, and other masses of information. Do you not admire the editors for putting in these lighter matters and sparing the space for noting them?

Their Majesties' second Court last Friday was well attended and some very lovely gowns were worn. The Duchess of Sutherland was much admired in white tulle and chiffon embroidered in tapering sprays with dull and burnished silver, and made Empire style. The white satin train was lined with cloth of silver and embroidered in silver. Lovely diamonds echoed the white light of the silver embroideries.

Adeline Duchess of Bedford wore velvet in a tone of Parma violet trimmed with a quantity of fine old rose point. The train was in chiffon of the same soft violet tint, and was very gracefully hung from under a hood of the rare old lace. Lady Blandford's was a beautiful gown, black lace embroidered in gold, silver and pink roses over pink silk, the black velvet train lined with pink and ruched with pink tulle. Lady Castlereagh had an uncommonly lovely dress in pale pink satin embroidered all over in silver in a design of rose, shamrock, and thistle worked in India. The cloth of silver train was veiled with pale pink chiffon and trimmed with rare old Alençon.

Among the brides' dresses Lady Gerard's was exquisite, strewn with diamonds in graceful lines and point Alençon train over cloth of silver. Mrs. Levita, another bride, had a wonderful Paquin gown of Brussels appliqué over dewdrop net, under which was a veil of chiffon over satin, a chef d'œuvre.

House-cleaning time has come round again, and the question comes up about wall-papers and fresh chintzes, curtains, etc. We have had a discussion as to whether it is better to choose the wall-covering first and chintz after, or to proceed in the reverse way. What is your idea? For our part we began with the chintz, partly because we found in a book of patterns from Gorringe, Nottingham, a perfectly delicious one, No. 1,139, with a French design in chené tints on a white ground. Dreamy tones of pinkish mauve and pale yellow are introduced, and the pattern waves about in an airily graceful way, like smilax in a summer breeze. By the way, have you ever seen their reversible cretonne? So convenient for curtains, since it needs no lining. The blue poppies and green leaves (design No. 1,135) is so artistic and uncommon. There are many others, and sweetest cretonnes, one with small baskets of pink roses slung with pastel blue ribbons. The taffetas cretonnes are very handsome, and the pure white just the thing for country cottages, for bed and window curtains. It is striped like dimity, and has little raised flowers. The pattern-book for curtains is equally tempting. The crêpe antique is not only lovely in colouring, but of beautiful draping quality. It looks like hand embroidery on fine voile. The Madras muslins are in every tone of white and écru. No. L1,672 E is the prettiest, I think, and very uncommon-looking. The frilling is sold by the yard, all ready to run up, or if edging is preferred it is to be had at a penny a yard, in either white or écru, a neat little finish.

Next come wall-papers, and for this we made an expedition to Jeffreys, in Mortimer-street. It is simply impossible to judge from papers in pattern books how they will look when hung, so it is much better to go and see them in the piece, or even on the walls, as one often can at Jeffreys'. The friezes, too, can be better judged in this way. We saw some wonderful papers there, large designs as well as small; a dignified and slightly pompous Georgian which seems to reflect the human characteristics of its period; damasks in designs classical and up through the centuries to modern; flocks printed in oil, the patterns softened with sheeps' wool and goats' hair laid on by a special process; old Dutch designs reproduced in all their quaint sincerity, groups of flowers and detached blossoms; and then the "sweetly pretty" of our own day, as shown in the "Crown" papers, those with trails of blossoms running up to a frieze of similar flowers, but larger and more numerous. The apple tree is the newest of these, the lines climbing the wall representing the stem with little bursts of bloom and leaf upon it, and at the top the tree spreads out in fullest blossom. This will almost cut out the favourite wistaria of last season, and its companion the "Crown" laburnum.

Some of the neutral-tinted papers are very fascinating, especially those that look like canvas. We admired the stamped-leather papers illuminated by hand, and particularly one in a glory of peacock tints deftly intershoaling, green and blue and gold by Walter Crane. We noticed that among all these rich and handsome things there were papers as inexpensive and as suitable for small rooms as one can see in sample books anywhere. And seeing them in the piece is so very much more satisfactory.

And what would house-cleaning be without Globe polish? Servants always ask for it, for they say that metalwork of all kinds responds immediately to it, not only getting bright quickly, but keeping so, and saving them half the labour.

You must often have wondered where the heroines of men's novels get their "soft, clinging materials," which are so flimsy that they float, and so durable that they are still in wear on the last page? They wear them to breakfast, they wear them to dinner, and I have known a heroine to indulge in a flirtation on a P. and O. liner in a feathered hat and "trailing draperies." I should have thought that for wear at sea our good old friend, navy-blue serge, would be the only possible material. But men are so romantic, until they marry and have to pay for those trailing draperies and waving plumes. Then they agree with their wives that an English serge that never wears out is not only becoming, but sensible, and there is no reason why it should even be monotonous. We have been feeling and looking over about three hundred different patterns of various textures and qualities of serges, etc., from John Noble, in Manchester, ranging from 7½d. to 10s. 9d. a yard, and we could scarcely have believed in such infinite variety. Smooth serge, rough serge, plain serge, ribbed serge, blue serge, black serge, blue-black and black-blue serge, and all other coloured serges—there they are in booksful, and all with only one quality in common—they wash like house-flannel. Then there are other materials, cloth, cashmere, velveteen, chiffon, velvet, and as many checked and striped tweeds as there are serges. We really sent for the patterns because Bee wanted a morning costume of real English serge (she is going to learn punting before the river season, and wants to be free to fall in with an easy mind as often as the punt leaves her); and the result is that we are planning about half a dozen gowns each. There is a lovely shade of moleskin in the "Sterling" cashmere, which will look charming made after one of the sketches that came with the patterns; an indoor dress with a wide skirt, and a broad-pleated bodice, with loops of dull gold galon outlining a lace yoke crossed by straps of the cashmere. And Bee is having an outdoor dress of Ranger tweed, very soft, in light grey, with a large dim check in green, the coat-bodice made with long crossing lines edged with knife-pleated silk, and the belt and cuffs of spotted velvet. both skirt and bodice, and there is a lace vest. People are a little tired of boleros, and these coatish bodices that only need a fur out of doors are very useful.

Have you heard about the new hair-net? It is a capital idea turned into fact by the inventors. The net is open for just sufficient space in the centre to allow one's "topknot" to emerge, and the little twist of hair that we all wear (or almost all of us) is consequently not flattened by the net, which fits in all round it. It is called the Conforma, and if correctly matched to the colour of the hair is quite invisible, being made of human hair. It is made in three sizes. Do not omit to get some. It is so annoying to find, after arranging one's hair beautifully, that after half an hour it is untidy. The Corforma prevents this and does not allow of a single wandering hair, and yet there is nothing dragged nor any suggestion of compulsion about the coiffure. They are no dearer than ordinary nets.

Please observe what very nice paper this is that I am writing on. It is a new discovery, and if you wish for some like it you must ask for Puryta parchment-stationery. This soft faint blue is so refined-looking, but it is also to be had in white, and is sold in shilling boxes containing five quires of any of the four sizes—8vo, imperial, albert, or duchess. This last is a dear little size for writing tiny notes. One's writing looks its best on this kind of paper, for it hits the happy medium between being rough or too highly glazed. A surprising amount of useful information in connection with correspondence is continued in "The Prompter," a little book sent out with Puryta.

What cigarettes to smoke? It is, of course, a matter of opinion. Egyptians, says Richard, who is never happy without a Nile Valley cigarette between his teeth. They are, he considers, so mild, so delicate, and yet so fragrant.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Although February is dead and gone we cannot shut our eyes to its shortcomings. As "February fill dyke" the month was a fraud, utterly failing to fulfil its traditional engagements and belying its established reputation. March comes in to find the dykes empty, and the value of its "peck of dust" not only gone down from the "King's ransom," but vanished. The last thing in the world we want just now is even a pinch of dust. The misconduct of February has made it a drug in the market; we are pining for rain instead, not light nor slight rain either, but for a good honest downpour to fill the empty dykes and set the springs going and the rivers flowing. No doubt all parts of the country are not in the same condition, but about here we are very dry, deliciously so, one feels inclined to say, who only thinks of personal comfort in the present, and leaves the future to itself.

Society does not want rain for its "season," the ordinary severities of winter are enough without any extra supply of it. The roses of a winter "season," such as we have over here, are much more beset with thorns than are those of a summer "season" like yours. We have often to go through a great deal in gathering them. Think of the nights of storm, snow, and frost on which we go our rounds of festivities. Last week the Castle season was very brisk, after the return of Lord and Lady Aberdeen from their short visit to the Royal Court and London. Lady Aberdeen, unfortunately, got a rheumatic chill, and Lord Aberdeen, unsupported, had to do the honours of many entertainments. He is a very energetic host, the most good-natured of Viceroys, always solicitous about the amusement of his guests. The problem of this season—and of many another before it—is the superfluous girl, at Castle balls and dances. Irish girls are good to look at, which is fortunate, as there are so many of them; sometimes, however, it is possible to have too much of a good thing. "Pretty maids all in a row," and without partners, are not a happy sight at a dance. Yet what is to be done when they strongly outnumber the men, who do not go round, even with veterans pressed into the service? Lord Aberdeen does all he can, and is very active in the dance himself. When the suffragettes have established the equality of the sexes no doubt the girls will cease to stand in rows; they will saunter about the rooms, go to supper independently, and otherwise enjoy the exclusive privileges of men even in ball-rooms.

On Monday there was a big dinner at the Castle, on Tuesday a dance, on Thursday a ball, and on Friday an afternoon concert. A goodly list of entertainments for one week, and then, in addition, were the rehearsals for the great social event of this week, the Lace Ball, the lessons in step-dancing for the jigs, reels, etc. One cannot but think that the wear of lace and the dancing of jigs and reels do not go well together, neither are these kinds of dances specially a case of fitness at a court. The greatest enthusiast for the Celtic revival would hardly maintain that they were danced at the Royal Court of Tara, or in Kincora, the palace of King Brian Boru. One thinks, in the case of Mr. Birrell's common-sensible speech, of those "who are more Irish than the Irish themselves." The good intention, however, is the saving cause. Supposing the British court were to go in for an ancient British revival, what were the dances at the court of Queen Boadicea? The ball on Thursday night was a very big one, with dancing in both the St. Patrick's Hall and the Throne room. Many pretty dresses were worn in soft and shiny materials, with bright embroideries of many kinds. Lord Aberdeen danced the State quadrille with the Duke of Abercorn's daughter, Lady Alexandra Hamilton. Lady Wicklow, who was also in it, wore a charming costume with many jewels. Amongst other guests were Ladies Granard and Mowbray and Stourton, resplendent in diamonds. The latter is staying in Dublin with her daughter, having spent the early part of the season in Malta. Lady Powerscourt was prettily dressed, and Lady Weldon, Ladies Clarina, Arnott, and MacDonnell chaperoned daughters. Lord and Lady Castletown were not present, owing to the death of Lady Castletown's mother, Lady Doneraile. Lady Clementine Waring was with her brother, Lord Arthur Hay. The Ladies Mabel and Violet Anson were on a visit at the Castle, where their brother Lord Anson is aide-de-camp. Lady Aberdeen was still obliged to stay in her room, but will, it is hoped, have regained her strength fully, and be able to do the honours of the Lace Ball with Lord Aberdeen.

Lord and Lady Ardilaun have not been staying this season at their residence, St. Anne's, near Dublin, but at Ashford, their place in Connemara, where they entertained the Prince of Wales. As usual, they had a party for the woodcock shoot there, which is of much renown. Lady Plunket has arrived from New Zealand, which her husband governs, on a home visit with some of her family. New Zealand is not a place of many social attractions, its ways are very new, and not yet softened by time and experience. Lord and Lady Plunket, however, have got on very well there, and done the honours of Government House very pleasantly. Sir Francis Plunkett, the late Ambassador, who died in Paris, was an Irishman of the old Catholic family, which spells its name with a double T, and whose head is Lord Fingall. Sir Francis was the uncle of the present peer, who lives at the family residence, Killeen, in the county of Meath, and, with Lady Fingall, is well known in Dublin society. The Plunkett family, both with a double and a single T, have a knack of being peers, no less than five titles being in the family: Lords Fingall, Louth, Dunsany, Plunket, and Rathmore, and all are Irish titles. Not a bad record for one family in Ireland.—Yours ever, CLARE.

Here are some nice recipes for you. Try these mullets à la Beaconsfield:—

Trim, wash and dry the mullets, put them into a buttered sautépan with half a bottle of champagne, some mushroom catsup, pepper and salt to taste. Bake them in the oven, and baste frequently. When cooked, glaze and dish them. Reduce the liquor, and add to it some minced prawns, thicken with a lump of butter, well rolled in cornflour. When smooth and of a nice thickness, put in a dessertspoonful of essence of anchovy.

Caramel cream pudding sounds tempting, does it not?

Make caramel by boiling 2 oz. of castor sugar with a dessertspoonful of lemon juice until it turns a golden colour, pour it into a plain mould. Steep a piece of vanilla pod in half a pint of milk on the stove to extract the flavour, pour it upon a tablespoonful of bread crumbs; when it is cold mix in 3 eggs, an ounce of sugar, and a dessertspoonful of rum. Steam the pudding in the prepared mould, without allowing it to boil; after it has somewhat cooled, take out a portion of the centre and fill the cavity with caramel cream, and when it is set turn it out on a glass dish. To make the cream, boil 2 oz. of sugar with water until it turns golden, allow it to cool, then whisk it with half a gill of whipped cream, adding a few sheets of dissolved gelatine.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NEW BOOKS

THREE CLEVER NEW NOVELS.

THE GOLDEN HAWK.

By EDITH RICKERT, 6/-
Author of "The Reaper" and "Folly."

"Dedicated to Mistral, this Provencal story is singularly fresh and individual. It has illusive suggestions, at times provoking one to think of Tartarin, but at all times keeping its own proper character. It opens in the perfection of romance, with Trillon, the gay troubadour, lightly fingering his fiddle as he approaches the ancient town of Castelar by the mountains. On the ramparts of Castelar sit three girls in the heyday of summer, and one of these is pretty Madaleno, daughter of Borel, the landlord of the cabro d'or. Trillon is mad and glad together, and his fiery southern heart leaps to the encounter. In a brief hour is Madaleno besieged and won. It is the spirit of true romance. 'The Golden Hawk' may be read, and will be read, with sheer pleasure in the exuberance of life."—DAILY MAIL.

THE SUNDERED STREAMS

By REGINALD FARRAR, 6/-
Author of "The House of Shadows."

"A book of strong originality and striking outline. The blending of the absolutely normal with the thrillingly mysterious makes the book what it is. For the style, it is good, with many vitriolic thumb-nail portraits, such as the description of the 'modern woman, who is perfectly virtuous, except in dress, manners, and mind.'"—EVENING STANDARD.

BENEDICT KAVANAGH.

By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM, 6/-
Author of "The Seething Pot" and "Hyacinth."

"The book is gloriously alive—alive with humour, satire, wit, and the exhilaration that comes from a great belief. 'Benedict Kavanagh' has caught the atmosphere of contemporary Ireland as no other book in English has yet done."—WEEKLY SUN.

NOTICE.—*The Second Volume of the GREAT WORK on the Russo-Japanese War by Sir Ian Hamilton, containing accurate and striking accounts of the tremendous battles of Liaoyang and the Shaho, is Now Ready in large quantities at all Booksellers' and Libraries. SOME PROBLEMS OF EXISTENCE. By NORMAN PEARSON. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE NEXT STREET BUT ONE.
By M. LOANE, Author of "The Queen's Poor." 6s.
DAILY MAIL.—"Level-headed practical, and exceptionally keen, it is an almost unique contribution to the literature of a question which yearly becomes more pressing. Miss Loane's former book, 'The Queen's Poor,' earned her high praise from some of those who knew what she was talking about. This volume is indeed by far the best work of its sort we have been fortunate enough to come across."

Westminster Gazette:—"The figure of Amalia is a delightfully fresh and natural one, instinct with a real touch of nature."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

SIX NOVELS OF MERIT.

Messrs. Greening beg to suggest that the following six novels might with advantage be placed on your library list this week, as each novel is calculated to please a different taste.

MR. HARRIS BURLAND'S NEW ROMANCE.

1. THE GOLD WORSHIPPERS.

By J. B HARRIS BURLAND,
Author of "The Financier," &c. 6/-
Those who enjoyed "The Financier" will not fail to read "The Gold Worshippers," of which The Morning Leader says: "There is the proper thrill in it, and one does not want it to end."

2. FOR THIS CAUSE.

By GEORGE IRVING, Author of "Love." 6/-
"'Tis best to be off with the old love before you are on with the new" is the note of this book.

3. THE OUTER DARKNESS.

By R. H. WRIGHT. 6/-
"When you read in the first chapter the following words: 'I, Martin Sanford, departed this life on 21st Feb., 189—, and was buried——', curiosity alone compels you to read more."
To quote The Dundee Courier, "the author is to be congratulated in writing, at all events, a fanciful and imaginative story on a somewhat novel subject."

4. THE SECOND BLOOM.

BY HELEN V. PORTER. 6/-
This novel is concerned with a descendant of "Bonnie Prince Charlie," and deals with the plots of the later Jacobites. The Daily Express says that "the story is told in a workmanlike manner, and never allows its interest to relax."

5. I WILL REPAY.

A Romance by BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel." 18th Thousand. 6/-
Any work from the pen of the author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel" commands attention, and those who have followed the fortunes of that doughty yet debonair character will hasten to renew the acquaintance in "I Will Repay."

6. DAVRAY'S AFFAIRS.

A Novel by REGINALD TURNER, Author of "The Steeple," &c. 6/-
The author of "Uncle Peaceable" in that book shows his sense of humour, whilst in "Davray's Affairs" he grapples with a moral problem. The Daily Mail says: "Mr. Turner is distinctly advancing his reputation."

THE CARE OF THE HAIR.

A Warning against the use of "Cure-all" Hair Remedies.

Do you know that there are scores of different ways in which your hair may be attacked, and which lead in the long run to baldness, or greyness, or scurf, or scalp irritation?

It may be attacked in the root, in the shaft, or even in the sac or follicle in which it grows.

You may be rendered bald through the action of some microbe, or some minute vegetable organism, or through the action of scurf, or through atrophy of the hair-bulb.

Your hair may be too greasy or it may be too dry, it may be planted too tightly in the skin of your scalp or too loosely; greyness or discoloration may be due to several different reasons, irritation of the scalp to half-a-dozen others.

Greyness, baldness, scurf, and irritation of the scalp are not the same disorders, nor are their causes alike. The same remedy cannot cure them all.

If you wish to possess, cultivate, or keep a good head of hair you must know something about its structure and its nature. This is fully explained in a most interesting book entitled "The Hair: its Growth and its Disorders," which every reader of "Truth" who is suffering from any hair complaint may obtain free of all charge by writing to Mr. Warner Oliver, the eminent consultant on the hair, of 4, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, W.

This book contains no puff or advertisement of any of the specific, so-called "cure-all" hair restoratives, whether for external or internal use, and nothing is offered for sale—therefore its readers can rely upon the advice which it gives as regards the general treatment of the hair, and the steps to be taken when hair trouble exists. All that is necessary when writing is to mention "Truth," and to state whether you are Mr., Mrs., Miss, Rev., or titled, and a copy will be sent to you gratis and post free.

FIGHTING CHANCE
By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS,
Author of "Cardigan."

Illustrated by FRED PEGRAM. Price 6s

FIRST EDITION Exhausted Immediately on Publication.

SECOND EDITION Nearly Exhausted.

THIRD EDITION in Preparation.

THE WORLD says: "Distinctly a book to arrest attention. It is a powerful character study, so instinct with originality and force that it must stand out conspicuously."

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "'The Fighting Chance' is a novel of distinction and unusual cleverness which should strengthen firmly the author's hold on the regard of the critical."

TRUTH says: "By 'The Fighting Chance' Mr. Robert Chambers, an American novelist, will certainly secure the success he has already achieved in his own country."

THE QUEEN says: "This is a charming book."

THE ATHENÆUM says: "Mr. Chambers has achieved another success."

THE GRAPHIC says: "Treated with unquestionable power."

THE STANDARD says: "A tremendously absorbing kind of novel. . . . . Every page pulsates with the echo of the steps of real people with real thought, real life."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN says: "Mr. Chambers gives us a striking picture of American Society. 'The Fighting Chance' is undoubtedly a book to read."

THE ACADEMY says: "The cleverness, vivacity, and insight into human nature will deservedly secure for it as great a success in England as it already enjoys in America."

THE WEEKLY SUN says: "'Fighting Chance' is a really distinguished attention-binding book, the best book, I think, that has been published since the New Year."

THE DAILY MAIL says: "It is a pleasure in these days to take up a novel which cannot be read through at one sitting, and forgotten as soon as it is laid down."

"These remarkably 'indiscreet' letters are more exciting than ninety-nine novels out of a hundred."—Daily Graphic.
"The writer roughly drags aside the veil which a discreet diplomacy had drawn over the truth, and gives us . . . a book remarkable alike for its sincerity, its dramatic power, and its amazing indiscretion. The lurid account here given of the sack of Peking by the allied armies is an appalling revelation of the demoralisation into which the troops fell."—Morning Post.

MORNING LEADER.

TWO NOVELS THAT MOST PEOPLE ARE READING and all should read.

The TRIBUNE says: "Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has, in the jargon of the day, been called a 'coming man.' THERE IS NO DOUBT NOW THAT HE HAS COME. He has come into the broad field of historical romance, and has broken lances with the champions."

Exton Manor

The author of "The House of Merrilees" has in "Exton Manor" given us a novel that bids fair to eclipse the popularity of his former books. The Athenæum praises it. Punch is enthusiastic. The Telegraph considers it better than any of its predecessors. The Globe finds it thoroughly enjoyable. The Standard says it is a pleasure to read a book like "Exton Manor"; and others too numerous to mention are equally appreciative. A Second Impression is now in the press.

The Artistic Temperament,

By Jane Wardle, will be published on Friday.

Privy Seal: His Last Venture.

It is not too much to say that Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's new novel, "Privy Seal," has been the one subject of discussion in literary circles during the last few days. The Tribune says: "The qualities which made 'The Fifth Queen' an unusual and noteworthy book are continued in 'Privy Seal.'" Mr. Hamilton Fyfe says: "If you don't read Mr. Hueffer's book you will miss a rare enjoyment." Daily News says: "The colouring is gorgeous; no writer has better realised the flaming exterior of the times than Mr. Hueffer."

When ordering for the Library please ask for the following books:

When the roots are not healthy and strong, or when they are affected by germs, YOUR HAIR will not—indeed, cannot—grow.

That is Why NOTHING CAN BE ANY GOOD for which is FALLING OUT or PREMATURELY GREY

HAIR

except CAPSULOIDS

Magnified diseased hair as seen through the microscope, showing how all the connections at the bottom were destroyed by germs, after which it became loose, and simply fell out. This hair is now under the microscope in the Capsuloid Company's office.

Magnified, strong, healthy hair, as seen through the microscope, showing how its healthy root was so firmly fastened at the bottom that when it was pulled it tore away all the surrounding tissues from the bottom of the follicle. This hair is under the microscope in the CapsuloidCompany's office.

This central diagram shows how a growing hair is placed in the scalp. You can see it draws all its nourishment from the little blood vessel which runs to the bottom of its root. All the growth of the hair occurs at that point. The growing cells draw their nourishment from the blood, and multiply and push upwards, so that, although you may see hair several feet long, all the growth of that hair has occurred, and is occurring, and always will occur only at the very bottom of the hair root.

The germs are there also, and just as the only means of nourishing hair is through the blood, so also the only means of killing the germs is through the blood. Look at the three pictures, and use your own common sense. Do not imagine that this is a subject which can be understood by doctors alone. Although there was nothing but ignorance on this subject for the past 5,000 years, our advertisements during the past few years have taught you enough about the hair that you should no longer be ignorant, but should be able to see how preposterous it is to try to cure by rubbing stuff on the hair and scalp. when a cure, you can see as well, even, as any doctor, can only be something which passes through the blood direct to those harmful germs, causing their death, and then nourishing the growing cells, and making the hair root firm again, and then causing the hair to grow once more as in perfect health. We have so often given proof, that we do not need to tell you again that the first and only remedy which has ever been discovered that can do this is

A PROSPECTUS IS NOW BEING ISSUED WHICH CONTAINS (INTER ALIA) THE FOLLOWING INFORMATION:—

A Copy of the full Prospectus has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

The SUBSCRIPTION LIST OPENED on March 4, 1907, and will CLOSE on or before March 7, 1907.

DOMINION OF CANADA.

British Columbia Electric Railway Company, Limited.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862-1900 (Imperial), and carrying on business under privileges granted by Acts of the Legislature of British Columbia.

SHARE CAPITAL ISSUED AND FULLY PAID UP..... £1,000,000.

£300,000 FIVE PER CENT. CUMULATIVE PERPETUAL PREFERENCE STOCK. £300,000 FIVE PER CENT. NON-CUMULATIVE PREFERRED ORDINARY STOCK, and £400,000 DEFERRED ORDINARY STOCK.

SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE BEING INVITED FOR £300,000 4½ PER CENT. PERPETUAL CONSOLIDATED DEBENTURE STOCK (Part of an issue limited as within mentioned).

The Stock bears interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, payable by warrant half-yearly on March 31 and September 30 in each year. A full half-year's interest on the Stock now allotted will be paid on September 30 next.

THE PRICE OF ISSUE IS 98 PER CENT., PAYABLE AS FOLLOWS:

On Application	£5 per cent.
On Allotment	£10 ,,
On May 6, 1907	£25 ,,
On July 5, 1907	£25 ,,
On September 5, 1907	£33 ,,
	£98 per cent.

Or the whole may be paid up in full on Allotment, or on any Wednesday prior to September 5, 1907, under discount at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum. Interest will be charged on any instalments in arrear at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The above-mentioned Stock is Perpetual and Irredeemable, and is entitled to the benefits of a Trust Deed dated February 23, 1907, in favour of the British Empire Trust Company (Limited), whereby the whole of the Company's Assets and Undertaking, including its uncalled Capital, are charged by way of First Floating Charge according to English law, subject to the existing mortgages and charges created to secure £238,000 First Mortgage Debentures and £220,000 Vancouver Power Debentures now outstanding.

The Trust Deed provides that the total amount of the Debenture Stock shall be limited to the amount of the Share Capital of the Company for the time being issued and paid up; that no mortgage or charge shall be created ranking in priority to or pari passu with it; that so long as any of the First Mortgage Debentures or the Vancouver Power Debentures remain outstanding, an amount of Debenture Stock exceeding the amount of all the First Mortgage Debentures and Vancouver Power Debentures for the time being outstanding shall be retained unissued. When the Debentures at present outstanding have been redeemed, the Stock will form one Consolidated First Floating Charge on the whole assets of the Company.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Company is an English Limited Company, incorporated in 1897, and carries on, under powers conferred by Acts of the Parliament of British Columbia, a well-established Electric Railway, Lighting and Power Business in the cities of Vancouver, North Vancouver, New Westminster, Steveston, and Victoria, and surrounding districts in British Columbia.

The Company controls the whole of the Capital of the Vancouver and Victoria Gas Companies, both of which are carrying on a rapidly expanding and remunerative business.

The whole of the electrical energy utilised by the Company is generated by water-power. The Mainland Service is carried by electrical energy generated by the water-power installation of the Vancouver Power Company, Limited, the whole of the Share Capital of which is held by the Company.

The proceeds of the present issue are required for the general purposes of the Company to meet the necessities of its constantly increasing business, and more particularly in connection with increasing the capacity of the hydraulic electric plant at Lake Buntzen and with the construction and equipment of further Railways radiating from and supplementing the Company's existing systems.

The net earnings of the Company for twelve months to June 30, 1906 (including sales of bonus land and income from subsidiaries, but before providing for renewals maintenance), as certified by the Company's Auditors, were.....	£114,958
The amount required to pay Interest on the Debentures, including the present issue of Debenture Stock, is.....	33,360
Leaving a surplus of.....	£81.598

Available for provision for Renewals Maintenance, Dividends on Share Capital, etc.

For the half-year ending December 31, 1906, the Gross Earnings show an increase of £23,834 over the figures of the corresponding period in the preceding year, and the Net Earnings, including Income from Investments, but before providing for Renewals, show an increase of £18,391.

The Capital of the Company is £1,500,000, of which £1,000,000 is now issued and fully paid up, consisting of £300,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Perpetual Preference Stock, £300,000 Five per Cent. Non-Cumulative Preferred Ordinary Stock, £400,000 Deferred Ordinary Stock, all of which are quoted on the London Stock Exchange at substantial premiums.

The Reserve Funds of the Company now reach a total of £122,684.

The Full Prospectus contains details of Contracts and other material information which is omitted from this notice, and allotments will only be made upon the basis of the full Prospectus, copies of which (with application forms) can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, or from Messrs. Sperling and Co., Bond Court House, Walbrook, London, E.C.; and applications should be sent to Lloyds Bank Limited, 72, Lombard-street, London, E.C., or Branches; or to the Bank of Scotland, London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, or to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, London, with cheque for application money. By order of the Board. B. H. BINDER, Secretary.

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.

Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "the most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system of operating, although well known and very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY,

"Conforma"

REVOLUTION IN FRINGE NETS.

What is this revolution?

The ordinary fringe net is flat, and it therefore flattens the hair out of shape. It is difficult to handle, and requires a host of hairpins.

But the "Conforma" net, being made to the shape of the coiffure, encloses without crushing, whilst an opening in the net allows freedom for top hair-dressing.

The "Conforma" is easy to handle, and requires at the most two pins.

Made of real hair. Any shade hair or net matched.

OUR PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,460.

BEST SET OF RHYMED LINES OF VAGARIES OF ENGLISH VERBS.

The many excellent solutions sent in for this Competition have made the task of adjudication exceedingly difficult. After mature consideration, I have decided to divide the Prize of Two Guineas equally between ARACHNE, OISEAU, NICHOLA, and WHIG; each of whom will, therefore, receive half-a-guinea.

The Verses of these Competitors were printed in TRUTH of February 6 last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,461.

SENTENCES OF NOT MORE THAN THIRTY WORDS, CONTAINING THE GREATEST NUMBER OF SPOONERISMS.

The Prize in this Competition is awarded to LORNA, whose sentence was printed in TRUTH of February 13 last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,462.

POEMS, IN SERIOUS VEIN, DEALING WITH THE EARTHQUAKE AT KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

Some of the poems sent in for this Competition were really quite good—so good, indeed, that before long I propose to give our serious poets another chance of showing their talents.

I have decided to award half the Prize (One Guinea) to VOX, and to divide the remaining half between BEL DEMONIO and P. F. H., each of whom will, therefore, receive 10s. 6d.

The Poems of these three Competitors were printed in TRUTH of February 20 last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,467.

With Easter now so near at hand, one's thoughts naturally direct themselves to the subject of Bank Holiday; and as it is my laudable desire to keep our Puzzles, as far as possible, up to date, by dealing with topical events of the moment, I herewith offer the usual Prize of Two Guineas for:

THE BEST ALLITERATIVE AND EPIGRAMMATIC DESCRIPTION, IN NOT MORE THAN TEN WORDS, OF A TYPICAL ENGLISH BANK HOLIDAY.

I do not suppose it is necessary for me to explain the meaning of the epithet "alliterative;" but, in case it should be so, I will point out that all words must begin with the same letter.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) Each competitor, in this instance, is at liberty to send in two, but not more, alliterative epigrams

(ii) All epigrams must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, March 18th, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In reply to inquiries from several readers, I beg to point out that the award of Prizes in the Queer Story Puzzle, "The Kenwig Street Murder," was announced in TRUTH of February 20th last.

 The real name, with the address, of TONY, winner of three-quarters of Prize No. 1,459 is J. H. Morton, Esq., Ardbeg, Cambuslang.

QUILP.—Many thanks for sending me duplicate of your poem. The original was duly received.

RIMABEL.—Many thanks for your letter. The subject of the "triolets" is still under consideration.

ROUMANIAN.—Your real name and address duly noted.

CARLOS, PRESTO, BARGEE, URSELLIA, PEMBROKE, GLENLEVAN, and SACKI.—Very pleased to welcome you to our competitions.

ENVOY.—Very pleased to greet an old friend once more. Your change of address duly noted.

LAIDLAW.—Your nom-de-plume, with real address, duly registered. Very pleased to welcome you.

XLCOR.—I much regret that your solution of "Valentine" Puzzle was received too late for inclusion.

CARROTS.—Your poem was duly received, but, along with many others, was crowded out at the last moment.

C. L. BARNES.—Many thanks for your obliging suggestion, which I will consider.

SCEPTIC.—Very pleased to welcome you again after so long an interval. I trust you will now be able to take part in our competitions regularly.

DUDHOPE.—I note the correction of "ope" for "open" in your poem.

From time to time I receive inquiries from competitors expressing surprise that their solutions, in some given competition, have not been printed. I think it will save both them and myself much needless correspondence, if I point out that, owing to the large number of solutions sent in week by week, it is seldom possible to print more than a fraction of them, and that where (as is usually the case) there are many solutions between which there is nothing to choose, I try, as far as possible, to give a turn to those who have recently had to be crowded out. It may, indeed, occasionally happen that a really good solution suffers this fate. But that is no prejudice to the sender's chance of winning a Prize, as all solutions, both those in type and those in MS., are carefully considered in the adjudication.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Building, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new Competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,464.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

EXAMPLES OF A SMART AND APPROPRIATE PUNNING REJOINDER.

A gentleman was indiscreet enough to feed a lady's dog at the lunch table.

"I wish you wouldn't feed my dog," ejaculated the fair one, wrathfully. "I never allow him meat."

"I beg your pardon, I won't allow it to a cur again," was the soft answer.—Autolycus.

It may not be generally known that the sailor's term for intoxicated is "slewed."

In one of our seaport towns some years ago, a sailor, named Cain, was brought before a well-known magistrate, charged with being drunk and disorderly. The magistrate, on hearing his name, facetiously enquired, "Are you the man that slew his brother?" "No, your honour," promptly replied the man. "I'm the man that was slewed."

It is said that the man's ready wit obtained for him a light sentence.—Allegro.

"Au reservoir!" said the Englishman to the Frenchman at parting.

"Tanks!" replied Monsieur.—Nurse.

I crossed on one occasion with a party of friends from Tangier to Gibraltar on a remarkably cold, wet, and stormy day.

After having endured the discomfort on deck we all took shelter in the stuffy cabin, with the exception of one young lady, who had perched herself, wrapped up in rugs and waterproofs, on a little raised platform near the wheel, where she looked particularly forlorn as she became more and more drenched with the rain and spray.

I made several attempts to induce her to leave her uncomfortable seat, but in vain. At last I exclaimed, "For goodness sake do come, and don't sit there looking like an effigy." An aggrieved but rather defiant voice replied, "Shan't! Please leave me alone. If I look like an effigy it's nothing to you, and I don't care an F.I.G.!"

I retired rebuffed but very much amused at the retort, which I thought very clever under adverse circumstances.—Roumanian.

Country Theatrical Manager, who had engaged for stock company an actor named "Suet," addressing stranger after a terrible rain-storm:

"Are you Suet?"

Actor's reply: "No, dripping."—Presto.

Buncombe (a fleshly poet and a bore): Well, Jones, what do you think of my peroration?—

Dead to the glances others prize,
I long to live in Lucy's eyes.

Jones: Lucky dog! You may fulfil your wish. When I noticed the lady's eyes this afternoon, I saw that she had a sty in each of them.—Eboracum.

The late Rev. John Bent, well known to Etonians of a past generation, and much loved for his sterling worth and hilarious bonhomie, once gave his gratuitous services to a London church.

Happening to be in the church one day when some unknown ladies were looking around, he kindly pointed out the chief objects of interest. In the course of the resulting conversation, one of the ladies said: "May I ask if you are the incumbent of this parish?"

"No, madam," was the immediate reply, "I am only plain Bent, without the incum."—Fidelis.

"I've much finer feathers than you," shrieked the parrot

"Pinions differ!" croaked the raven.—Nibbler.

The late W. S. Caine, M.P., at a banquet in Liverpool, referred to the many puns he had heard made on his surname, and challenged any of the company present to invent a fresh one.

A reward of five shillings was jocularly offered to the inventor.

"Don't be in a hurri-cane," rejoined a guest, to whom the crown was at once tendered.—Pembroke.

"Why did you cut me at the morning party?" asked a younger son of a young lady. "The sun was in my eyes, and I did not see you." "Yes, the eldest son," was the biting rejoinder.—Dudhope.

A friend of mine (an adept in the gentle art of punning), on paying me a visit, and seeing for the first time my little boy of eighteen months, gave a good example of his punning ability. Knowing my pronounced taste for things literary, and seeing the heterogeneous samples of child's toys spread all about the floor, he said: "Old chap, you have always had literature in your head, but now I see you have provided yourself with plenty of litter-at-your feet!"—Veritas.

A celebrated living author lately observed that he rarely made a pun, "but when I do," said he, "I'm very proud of it, for it is always the very worst that ever was made, and therefore excellent. The other day," he continued, "a lady spoke to me of Mr. ——'s gallery of pictures, and remarked that she should like very much to get an introduction to see them. 'Well,' said I, 'he is my friend, and you shall go—you shall go and pick his pocket.' 'Pick his pocket!' she exclaimed. 'Why should I do so?' 'Why,' said I, 'because he has pict-ures.'"—Percy Vere.

"Ah!" said the fussy old nurse, closing the window and drawing the curtains to, "we must mind the son and heir."

"Madam," said the doctor, parting the curtains and throwing up the window, "the sun and air can look after themselves. You'd better forget them. This child can't have too much of them!"—Ox Short.

Two men were discussing a mutual acquaintance who bore the rich-sounding name, Aulay Macaulay.

"He comes of a good family," said one, "but they are poor. He has nothing but his name."

"I see," said the other, "its all he may call his own."—Pan.

"Everything comes by waiting," chuckled Juggins, as the stable-boy landed a dish of green peas on Algy's neck.

"Waiting!" grunted the injured one. "I should call it a superfluity of ex-pea-dish-us-ness."—Anno Domini.

Douglas Jerrold was on one occasion debating with a friend the respective merits of two contemporaries. The argument had been long, and, thinking to conclude it by a compromise, the friend remarked:

"Well, after all, they both row in the same boat."

"But not with the same skulls," rejoined Jerrold.—Tang.

A lady was speaking to a male friend about her son, who, she said, exhibited a profound distaste for female society, and shunned the fair sex generally.

"Isn't it distressing?" she queried.

"Mm—er—yes, it is—er—rather lass-er-hating," he replied.—Petros.

Q.—What was it Mr. Asquith said in the House of Commons about the whiskey frauds at Tullamore, in Ireland?

A.—That as the matter was to be dealt with in the Courts of Justice, he couldn't tell 'em more about it just then.—Little Jim.

TWO COCKNEY CLERKS ARE EXPLORING THE ISLAND OF JERSEY.

Green: Notice how all the cows are tethered? There's so little grazin' space here. Seems a bit cruel, though, don't it?

Brown: Well, I don't know; there's plenty of Gray's-Inn space in London, where they tether human beings like you and me!"

Green: I don't see what you mean.

Brown: No, the joke is pasture comprehension!—Thersites.

X (commenting on legal case): I consider the prisoner's agitation on being charged consistent with his innocence.

Y. Z: Well, it is, in a sense, but innocence it is not.—Hardie.

Several amateur literati contemplated the publication of a new magazine, which was to be written only by people of rank and high position in society. The question of a suitable title was discussed, and a lady famous for her wit was asked to suggest a title.

"Well," she said, "as you already have a 'Strand' magazine, I should call this one 'Cheap-Side.'"—Swanage.

In a mansion of flats, let both as private residences and offices, one occupant enquired of another as to the identity of a man ascending in the lift. "Oh, I think he is one of the 'privates.'" "Looks to me more like a 'lift-tenant.'"—Trebor Natram.

A certain London ground landlord, who is also a Municipal Reformer is said to have declared to a friend that rather than see another three years of Progressive rule on the L.C.C he would prefer an earthquake—to bring people to their senses.

"I can quite understand your preference for an earthquake," said his friend. "You are evidently thinking of the increase in ground rents."—Wyandotte.

The late Lord Grimthorpe, Edmund Beckett Denison, was not noted for urbanity and consideration for the feelings of others, even those of his professional brothers. One day when arguing in Court he required a document from his bag, which was lying on the barristers' table. "Give me that bag," he said bluntly to a member of the junior bar who was seated near it. The young man made no movement. "Don't you hear me?" thundered Denison. "I want that bag with E. B. D. on it." Then the young barrister turned his face towards his senior, and said, with a languid drawl, "U. B. D."—Nemo.

A young lady was once dilating on her troubles to a gentleman friend, and ended, "So I am sad, you see" (Sadducee), to which her friend gallantly returned, "You are fair, I see." (Pharisee).—Sarnia.

Some eminent lawyers had been dining in the Inner Temple, and were looking for their hats in the lobby outside the hall. Sir John Lewis could not find his. "Here," said Sir David Dundas, handing one to him. "Is this the Castor?" "No," answered Sir John Lewis, "that's Pollock's." (Pollux).—Cortex.

F. (apropos to never mind what): I'm sick of the subject.

L.: That is why you bring it up again, I suppose.—Parrot.

"Well, Pat, when did you last see our old friend Smith?"

"I saw him last month making the ascent of Mount Vesuvius with his young lady."

"And was he indulging in his old weakness, kissing?"

"Well, I didn't actually see him kissing, but sure enough that was his object, as he was trying to get at the mouth of the cratur."—Ildhart.

"I think I'd better apply to the County Council for a bag for them," said our school correspondent when playfully bantered on the way he was tying up his books at the close of our last meeting. "Better not," retorted a manager, "they might give you the sack."—Brad.

The noted punster, Hood, when on his deathbed, was told that a great friend of his (an erstwhile bachelor) had been egged on to matrimony. He thereupon made the reply, "I hope the yolk will set well."—Doveae.

The boys of a certain school in the north of England were playing football, when the outer case of the ball, after a violent kick, was found to be burst at one of the seams.

No other ball was available, so in distress the boys took the ball to the form master.

"What shall we do, sir, our ball has burst?"

"Hum." was the answer, "so it seems!" (Sew its seams.)—Hyde.

I was dining with a friend at the Sheridan Club in Dublin, and in cutting a bit off the leg of a chicken the knife slipped, and shot a piece into my friend's glass of Beaune, whereupon he said, "Bother you, you have put some of your fowl into my Beaune." He had to go away for a minute, and in the meantime the waiter removed his plate. On his return he said, "Confound it, you have collared my chicken." I replied, "Hang it man, there is no pleasing you, first you say that I have fowled your Beaune, and then you say that I have boned your fowl!"—Leo.

Ducrow was teaching a boy to go through a difficult act of horsemanship, and, the boy being timid, his master applied the whip to him unmercifully. Joseph Grimaldi was standing by, and looked very serious.

"You see," said Ducrow to Joey, "that it is necessary to make an impression on these young fellows."

"Very likely," replied Joey; "but it is scarcely necessary to make the whacks (wax) so hard."—Arundo.

At an evening party, where music was one of the principal features, the host approached a young lady and said, "May we have the pleasure of a song from you, Miss C.?"

She answered, "I am sorry not to be obliging, but I am a little hoarse this evening."

"Ah," said he, "you may be a little hoarse (horse), but you mustn't say nay (neigh)."—Sacki.

Consider Your Health!
When you consider how much depends upon it, what can be more important to you than the state of your health! If you are troubled with bad or indifferent health your capacities for work or pleasure are affected—even your life is threatened. Thousands know by old experience that are a blessing in the household and in every country of the world. No other medicine exercises so marked a control over Biliousness, Sick-Headache, Nervous Prostration, Indigestion, Constipation and other painful forms of stomachic troubles.
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS are good alike for man, woman and child, if taken according to directions. They are pre-eminently a family medicine—a remedy to have by one in readiness for every occasion when need arises.
There is yet another point in this connection that you should mark on the tablet of your memory. BEECHAM'S PILLS, in addition to their acknowledged value in Kidney, Liver, and Stomach disorders, have a specially beneficial effect in such ailments as are peculiar to women, many of whom endure needless pain and ill-health through ignorance of this important fact.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1576. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, March 13, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inqui e about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no not ce will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" s nd replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 3d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE recent death of Sir Francis Tress Barry, of St. Leonard's Hill, Windsor, has led to the disclosure of a fact which is of great interest to me personally, and will not be less so to all readers of Truth and to many thousands of little people who never heard of him, and can know nothing of this paper but its name. I have been informed by Sir Francis Barry's family that it was he who, for many years in succession, had anonymously presented a new sixpence to every child in the workhouses and workhouse schools of London at Christmas in connection with the Truth Toy Show. In the brief obituary notice of Sir Francis that appeared in these columns last week, reference was made to the munificence of his charities, but I little thought that I had such a close personal interest in one of them, or that I was recording the death of the unknown benefactor of so many generations of workhouse children.

It was in 1883, when the Truth Toy Show was comparatively in its infancy, that a commissionaire first dropped into Truth Office a week or two before Christmas, with a big parcel of sixpences fresh from the Mint, and a letter signed "A Friend," requesting the Editor, as if it were a great favour, to distribute the coins in the workhouses and their schools in connection with the Truth Toys and Dolls. For years since the same event has always occurred about the same date, varied only by the increase of the donation as the donor heard of the growth of the juvenile population of the London workhouses, and by the fact that of late years a relative of the unknown friend has replaced the commissionaire as the bearer of the gift. The number of sixpences began at 5,000; but for many years past the number has been 11,000, and it was characteristic of the thoughtfulness of the donor that after he saw from the Toy Fund accounts that the distribution of the sixpences over London and the suburbs by special messengers involved a charge upon that Fund, he always sent with the coins a cheque for £5 to defray this cost. Again and again I have expressed the wish that this unknown "Friend" would allow me an opportunity of thanking him personally, but the gentleman who has been his messenger for so many years always assured me that his relative desired to remain unknown, and I could only respect his wish. Guesses, of course, I have made, as have other people, but they all prove to have been quite wide of the mark. The opportunity of thanking the unknown benefactor has never come; but I am glad to be able at last to render the honour where it is due.

Perhaps some one may say that this story of Sir Francis Barry and the children's sixpences is only a story of a rich man's whim. For the sake of ten thousand or more of the poorest of London children, who will be looking in vain next Christmas for new sixpenny pieces from Truth Office, I can only wish that rich men were more given to indulging such whims. But though rich men are common, I fear that the qualities which have prompted Sir Francis Barry's benefaction are rare—the true kindliness of heart which finds its highest pleasure in bringing pleasure to those who are strangers to it; the love of little children though unknown, unseen, and unattractive; the shrinking from all personal praise or recognition for a good deed—unless it be the reward promised to him whose alms are in secret.

FRANCIS TRESS BARRY.

The Children's Friend.

O thou who play'dst good Fairy's part,
And didst so oft at Yuletide send Delight to many a little heart—
Farewell, thou friendless children's friend.

Bright glittered each new silvern prize,
Fresh from the Mint, which thou didst send,
But brighter shone the bairnies' eyes,
In thanks to thee, their unknown friend.

Full many a man—we know—his pelf
In charity, for fame, will spend:

Not thine to advertise thyself—
The nameless children's nameless friend.

Now there, above, a countless band,
Children on children without end,
Throng thee around and clasp thy hand—
They know thee now, their unknown friend.

No prayer we breathe—what need of such?—
Nor to Christ's mercy recommend.
Thy passport's sure ('tis "Inasmuch")
To Him, the children's own best Friend.

The King is not expected to return to England until April 26 or 27, when his Majesty will take up his residence at Buckingham Palace until Whitsuntide. The King proposes to attend the First and Second Spring Meetings at Newmarket.

It is probable that the next and third Levee will be held at St. James's Palace by the King directly after his return from the Continent, very likely on Monday, April 29. The fourth and last Levee of the season will be held by his Majesty after the Whitsuntide holidays, probably on June 3, which will be Monday in the Derby week.

The King has conferred the First Class of the Royal Victorian Order on Prince Charles of Hohenzollern, who paid a brief visit to their Majesties at Windsor Castle in January. Prince Charles is the third and youngest son of the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (who is de jure the head of the Hohenzollern family, a great territorial magnate, and one of the richest Royal personages in Europe), a brother of the Crown Prince of Roumania, and son-in-law of the Comtesse de Flandre. He belongs to the Roman Catholic branch of the Hohenzollern family. Prince Charles was invested with the ribbon and insignia last week at Berlin by Sir Frank Lascelles.

Some of the Continental papers are very busy making plans for the King, all of which are evolved out of their own fertile and ingenious imaginations. One journal states that directly after Easter his Majesty will arrive at Cauterets for a stay of three weeks, while another asserts that the Château de Thorenc, at Cannes, the well-known residence of Lord Rendel, is being prepared for his reception. As a matter of fact, the King, as has already been announced in Truth, will proceed on a cruise in the Mediterranean in the Royal yacht when he leaves Biarritz about April 1. His Majesty will land from the Victoria and Albert about April 25, at Venice, Genoa, or Marseilles, and will then return direct to London. The Queen will probably come back to England by sea, in which case it is expected that she will be joined at Gibraltar by the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife and their daughters, who will accompany her Majesty to Portsmouth.

One or two journals have announced that when the King is on his way back to England he will stop for three days in Paris, where his Majesty is to be the "official guest" of the President of the French Republic, and it is added that King Alfonso will be in Paris at the same time, also as the guest of the nation. All this is not only untrue, but it is extravagantly absurd. There is no idea of the King paying an official visit to Paris. As to King Alfonso, he was "the guest of the nation" for a week in May, 1905, and therefore there can be no idea of his returning there again, for long intervals always elapse between such public visits. When a Sovereign pays an official visit to a capital, care is always taken by the Government (or the Court) that his stay does not clash with that of any other Sovereign, in order to avoid vexatious difficulties as to etiquette and precedence which would be certain to crop up copiously under such circumstances.

An article describing how the King travels appears in a monthly magazine, in which it is stated that his Majesty's journeys to and from Scotland always take place by night. As a matter of fact, the King has invariably travelled to and from Scotland by day for several years past, and his Majesty has entirely given up night journeys, except when he has to proceed for a very long distance on the Continent, such as from Flushing to Marienbad, or from any Italian city to Calais. Queen Victoria much preferred night travelling, but her journeys between England and Scotland gave an enormous amount of anxiety and trouble to the railway officials, which would have been greatly diminished if she could have been induced to travel by day.

The Daily Mail announced last Wednesday that the visit of the Empress Dowager of Russia to England is a "striking manifestation" of "the good feeling and friendship which has grown up between this country and Russia." This is mere froth and twaddle. The visit of the Empress Marie, which has long been in contemplation, has not a particle of political significance. It would be just as reasonable to attach any such importance to the visits of the Empress Marie and the Queen to Copenhagen. It is certainly something new to hear that the Empress Dowager is "a valuable ally" to the Russian Liberal, who has always been under the impression that she was a resolute advocate of the old absolute system of government in Russia.

The papers have been falling into strange blunders in their dissertations on the Empress Dowager's visit. One of them announced on Thursday that "forty-four years have passed since the mother of the Tsar set foot on English soil," and the same nonsense was repeated in other papers. As a matter of fact, the Empress Marie (then Tsarevna) spent over six weeks in England with her husband during the summer of 1873. The Times was nearly as much astray in stating that in 1873 the Empress Marie visited England "on the occasion of the marriage of her sister-in-law, the Grand Duchess Marie, to the Duke of Edinburgh," and the Pall Mall Gazette fell into the same error. The wedding in question took place at St. Petersburg in January, 1874, and the couple had been betrothed at Sorrento in April, 1873.

It is rumoured that the Empress Marie will leave England with the Queen on the Royal yacht, and that she will accompany their Majesties on their cruise in the Mediterranean, during which Naples and Athens are to be visited by the Victoria and Albert.

A morning paper announced last week that Edinburgh "is preparing a great welcome for the Prince and Princess of Wales when they visit that city in April." The Prince and Princess are not to visit Edinburgh until the second week in July, when the show of the Highland and Agricultural Society is to be held at Prestonfield. The statement that the Prince and Princess are to be the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch at Dalkeith Palace during their visit to Glasgow in April is altogether incorrect, for they are to stay at Blythswood House, Renfrewshire, with Lord and Lady Blythswood, as was announced in Truth several weeks ago.

It was stated in Truth four weeks ago that the Prince of Wales would probably be the guest of Lord and Lady Derby at Knowsley Hall for the Liverpool Spring Races. H.R.H. is to arrive at Knowsley from London in time for dinner on Wednesday next, and he will return to town on Saturday, the 23rd. The Prince intends going to the races both on Thursday and on Friday, and this will be his first visit to Aintree.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are expected to reside at Marlborough House until the end of next week, when they will go to Sandringham to spend the Easter holidays at York Cottage, and Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck are to pay them a visit there. The Prince and Princess of Wales and a party from Sandringham will attend the West Norfolk Hunt Steeplechases, which are to take place over a course near Fakenham on Easter Monday. The announcement which has gone round the press that the Prince and Princess are to visit the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe at Floors Castle at Easter is a pure invention. Indeed, the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe have just gone abroad, and are not expected to return to Floors for several months. The contemplated visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales will take place in October.

Princess Victoria is expected to arrive at Buckingham Palace on Saturday from visiting the King and Queen of Norway at Christiania. H.R.H. will accompany the Queen to the Mediterranean in the Royal yacht, and it is probable that she will stay for some time at Gibraltar with the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife.

It was announced in Truth a fortnight ago that the King would shortly confer the Order of the Garter upon the King of Saxony, and that the Prince of Wales would go to Dresden on a special mission to invest his Majesty. My statement has been reproduced by numerous daily and weekly journals, but one of the latter varies its borrowed information from Truth by announcing that "it is understood" that Prince Alexander of Teck will go to Dresden. If there is now a special mission to Dresden the Prince of Wales will be at the head of it as a matter of course. His Royal Highness went three years ago to Stuttgart to invest the King of Wurtemberg; and the King of Saxony, being a more important Sovereign, would most certainly consider himself slighted if a collateral member of the Royal family were sent to Dresden. There has never been any doubt as to the arrangement, and the Prince and Princess of Wales were to have paid a visit to the Grand Duchess Augusta of Mecklenberg-Strelitz, who is now at Dresden.

It is now probable, however, that there will be no special mission to Dresden, as the King of Saxony, who is now at Lisbon, intends to spend a few days at Biarritz on his homeward journey. It is therefore understood that the King will take the opportunity of himself investing King Frederick Augustus with the ribbon and insignia of the Garter. A year or two ago the Prince of Wales accepted a Saxon decoration. It is believed that the real object of the King of Saxony's journey to Lisbon is to arrange for the betrothal of the Crown Prince of Denmark to his eldest daughter.

Last week a party of visitors stayed at Dublin Castle, the number being added to by the arrival of Lady Bessborough and Lady Gweneth Ponsonby, and Lady Fitz-Gerald and Miss Nesta FitzGerald. Dinner parties were given each evening. The "Lace Ball" on Tuesday was attended by over 1,000 guests. Lady Aberdeen, notwithstanding her indisposition, was present for a short time to witness the success of the entertainment she had planned and worked for with so much energy. The ball gave an excellent object-lesson in the artistic beauty of many kinds of Irish needlework and the exquisite and dainty suitability of Irish lace for evening dress.

Lady Aberdeen unfortunately had a relapse of her illness, and was unable to be present at the ball on Thursday evening in St. Patrick's Hall, the dinner parties throughout the week, or the afternoon party on Friday. It is hoped that she may be recovered enough to appear at St. Patrick's Ball, which will be held this week on the 15th inst., in anticipation of the Feast of the Irish National Saint, which falls on Sunday, the 17th inst.

Lord and Lady Grenfell have again taken up their residence at the Royal Hospital. Little or no entertaining has been done there this season owing to family mourning, on the death of Lady Victoria Grenfell. It it expected that Lord and Lady Grenfell will entertain later on, probably not until after Easter, and keep up the Royal Hospital tradition of hospitality.

"A Lover of English Scenery" writes:—

Please back up the Bill which has been introduced in the House of Commons at the instance of the National Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising. It seeks to restrict the display of such advertisements as affect injuriously the amenities of a public park or pleasure promenade, or disfigure the natural beauty of a landscape. I feel sure that this will have your sympathy. There are plenty of foreign precedents for such a law. Prussia has one more far-reaching than is proposed here. . . .

I hope that the Bill will be passed, but this appeal places me in a difficulty. If I began to argue in favour of such a measure on æsthetic grounds I should be suspected of a sordid motive. It is a cynical age. Unkind critics would hint that my real object was to divert, to the enrichment of my advertising columns, some of the money now spent in uglifying English rural scenery. It is, indeed, just possible that I may really consider that this would be an advantage to the advertisers as well as to me, but, of course, I am precluded from saying so.

Though not a hunting man, I have never been an out-and-out opponent of the sport; nor do I think that I have ever laid myself open to the horrid charge—it is so regarded by many people—of being a sentimentalist. Certainly, the hunting of carted deer has always struck me as an objectionable travesty of real sport, which is moreover continually brought into discredit by such incidents as those at Wendlesham and elsewhere, which have been reported in the papers during the past few days. But the pursuit of the wild red deer on Exmoor has always appeared to me to be a very different pastime, worthier of sportsmen, and I am therefore all the more surprised to hear of the disgusting barbarism with which it is carried on at this season of the year. My informant, who is a hunting man himself, affirms that hinds heavy in calf are regularly hunted by the Devon and Somerset Stag-hounds, and that for this reason one landowner has forbidden the hunt to come on his estate. The revolting cruelty of the practice speaks for itself. I have sometimes heard of similar cruelty through harriers and fox-hounds being taken out after the sport should have ceased for the season, but whatever the quarry may be, the practice is a debasement of sport, which will, I am sure, meet with the indignant condemnation of the best class of hunting men.

Since the above paragraph was written I have received from a correspondent the appended extract from the Hants and Berks Gazette of Saturday last. Comment upon it seems to be unnecessary:—

FOX KILLED IN THE HIGH-STREET (ODIHAM, HANTS).—Considerable excitement and interest were occasioned on Friday afternoon in last week, when a fox which had been hunted by the Garth hounds took refuge in Mr. Fountain's coal store at the back of his shop in the High-street. The fox, which the hounds had brought from Coxmoor, was in an exhausted condition, and quite done up; and it seems a pity that it was not given a chance of providing another day's sport on some other occasion. Instead of which the fox, which was a vixen, and in cub, was let out of the shed into the dogs' mouths, and was soon disembowelled. The carcase was then taken to the High-street, despoiled of its mask, brush, and pads, and then thrown to the dogs, who speedily made short work of it, much to the disgust of some residents.

THE FALL OF MAN.

So Mr. Zangwill says—I note—
(Nor would he, willing, tell a fib)
If women aren't to have a vote,
Eve might as well have stayed a rib.

But p'rhaps such logic, after all,
Don't prove his case; nay—truth to say—
The fair conclusion seems to fall,
In reason, just the other way.

For when Eve ceased a rib to be,
How did she on her life-work start?
Why, ate of the forbidden tree
And upset Adam's apple-cart.

Which conduct makes me eye askance
Eve's daughters' "Votes for Women" plan,
Lest, like their Ma, if they've the chance,
They re-enact the Fall of Man.

The recent sales at Christie and Manson's have afforded another striking example of the ruinous depreciation of the value of pictures by modern masters. Long's "Reading Don Quixote," purchased some years ago for 1,100 guineas, now realised 105 guineas; a work by Herbert, R.A., which sold for 480 guineas about thirty years ago, was knocked down for 26 guineas; a dozen of Cooper's pictures sold for an average price of under £80; a landscape by A. Vickers, which last changed hands at 400 guineas, went for 36 guineas; a work by Ary Scheffer fell from 265 guineas, not many years ago, to 26 guineas.

Mr. William Strang has been commissioned by the King to paint portraits of Lord Knollys, his Majesty's private secretary; of Sir Dighton Probyn, Keeper of the Privy Purse; and of Sir Richard Holmes, the late Librarian at Windsor Castle. These pictures are to be added to the collection in the private apartments at Windsor. Queen Victoria employed Angeli, of Vienna, to paint numerous portraits of her friends (such as Dean Stanley) and of the principal members of her household (such as Lady Ely, Sir Thomas Biddulph, Lady Augusta Stanley, and Sir Henry Ponsonby), most of which are in the private apartments at Windsor Castle.

The Bishop of Southwell has presented the Rev. Gerard Holmes Gore, curate of Newark-on-Trent, to the vicarage of St. Werburgh's, Derby, vacant by the appointment of the Rev. Reginald T. Talbot to a residentiary stall in Bristol Cathedral, on the nomination of the Lord Chancellor. St. Werburgh's, which is one of the most important livings in the diocese, was held for a number of years by the Bishop-Suffragan of Derby. Mr. Holmes Gore worked for three years under the Rev. Bernard Wilson at Bethnal Green, and he had previously spent three years at Great Grimsby. He is a zealous and a very popular clergyman, and his preferment has given much satisfaction in the diocese of Southwell.

Archdeacon Orpen, who has been Rector of Tralee for thirty-eight years, has been elected Bishop of Limerick in the place of the late Dr. Bunbury. He is a son of the late Sir Richard Orpen, of Ardtully Castle, and is one of the most popular and most respected clergymen in Ireland. After the election the Roman Catholic band paraded the streets of Tralee, followed by many hundreds of people, and the crowd stopped at the residence of the new Bishop and cheered him loudly. The stipend is about £1,350 a year, with residence. There are fifty-three incumbents and eleven curates in the Diocese of Limerick. The other candidates for the See were the Dean of Ossory and Archdeacon Wynne.

Canon Northcote, who died last week at Stoke-upon-Trent, was a member of the old Devonshire family of which Lord Iddesleigh is the head. He was at Oxford during the crisis of the Tractarian Movement, and, on leaving the University, he was ordained deacon by Bishop Henry Phillpotts. About a year afterwards he joined the Church of Rome and went abroad, and for some years he made Rome his principal residence. After his wife's death Mr. Northcote was received at the Oratory, Edgbaston, and became a friend and a devoted disciple of Newman. He was ordained priest in 1855, and worked zealously in the Potteries for five years, when he was appointed principal of Oscott College, a post which he held with conspicuous ability and efficiency for seventeen years. Since 1877 he had been a member of the Stoke Mission. Canon Northcote was a fine scholar, and he wrote largely. His little books on the catacombs of Rome are full of interest and instruction.

The death of the Rev. David Purnell-Edwards, of Stancombe Park, is much regretted in the Dursley district of Gloucestershire, as he was very popular among all classes, and was most highly esteemed. He was a nephew of the once well-known Canon Jelf, who in his day was one of the most prominent of the Oxford dons. Canon Jelf gave Mr. Edwards a studentship of Christ Church, and he ultimately became senior student. He held the college living of North Nibley, near Dursley, for thirty-two years, and was greatly beloved by his parishioners. He assumed the name of Purnell when his wife succeeded to the estates of her grandfather, Mr. P. B. Purnell. Stancombe Park, which is beautifully situated under a range of hills, is celebrated for a most interesting collection of Roman remains, and on the estate is the site of a Roman villa, which extended over six acres.

Canon Page-Roberts has been elected Proctor in Convocation for the Chapter of Canterbury in the place of the late Canon Holland. He will be a valuable addition to the Broad Church and Liberal Party in the Lower House. Canon Page-Roberts, who is incumbent of St. Peter's, Vere-street, was appointed to his stall at Canterbury in 1895 by Lord Rosebery, and he is now the senior canon residentiary of the Cathedral.

The Dean and Chapter of Rochester have presented the Rev. Edward Nash, Precentor of the Cathedral, to the vicarage of Leatherhead, which will be vacated at Easter by Archdeacon Utterton, who last year succeeded the late Archdeacon Sapte as Archdeacon of Surrey and Canon Residentiary of Winchester Cathedral. The living of Leatherhead (which has been held by Archdeacon Utterton for over thirty years) is of the net value of about £500 a year, with house.

The annual review of the position, requirements, management, revenue, and cost of the hospitals of Great Britain and Ireland with which Sir Henry Burdett introduces "Burdett's Hospital and Charities" is, as usual, full of instructive information. Particularly interesting is the chapter dealing with the misuse of hospitals. To show the extent of the growth of free medical relief, figures are quoted showing the proportion of free patients to population in thirteen large towns in the United Kingdom over a term of years. Dublin supplies the most remarkable example of the increase, for there 1 out of 1.3 of the population is admitted to free medical treatment. London is not much better, for, according to the latest figures obtainable, practically 1 in 2 of the whole population are in receipt of free medical relief. I agree with Sir Henry that the system which permits such a state of affairs is unjust, not only to the hospitals and their medical officers, but to the great body of medical practitioners, to the supporters of the hospitals, and to the patients in most need of medical aid. I agree, also, with his contention that the provision of paying hospitals for those whose surroundings do not permit of home treatment would do much to remedy the evil complained of, and the suggestions Sir Henry makes regarding the organisation of a large system of insurance to provide the necessary funds is well worth consideration.

Apropos of a recent case, I have had a letter from a nurse who is greatly distressed by the discredit her profession suffers from the doings of those whom she describes as wolves in sheeps' clothing—adventuresses posing as nurses. Of course, this is very unpleasant, but there is no help for it. Nurses, after all, are not the only people who are aggrieved in the same way. The theatrical profession is saddled with the sins of many impostors who are described in the police court charge-sheets as actors and actresses, though their only public appearance is made in the dock. Journalists, too, if they could blush at all, would blush for shame at the frequency with which their calling is similarly besmirched by all sorts of shady characters.

My correspondent goes on to complain that the nursing uniform is assumed nowadays by numbers of women who, even if they do not bring it into disgrace, are not nurses at all. This is true, the motive being usually nothing more sinister than a little feminine vanity. The dress is really rather attractive, a fact of which the legitimate wearers are, perhaps, not altogether unconscious. I can only think of one method by which they can guard against imitations of their professional costume. It is that they should adopt one that is ugly—or at least dowdy—and that remedy would, I expect, be regarded by most of the nurses as worse than the evil it was designed to cure.

I have to acknowledge 10s. from Une Poupée 5s. from T. E. G. towards the Toy Fund.

There is an uncommonly interesting little passage in a letter in the Nation on the disappearance of the Militia, signed "M.":—

Shortly after the conclusion of the Boer War, I had the opportunity of discussing with Kaiser Wilhelm the military changes in the British Army which were suggested by our saddening experiences. The Kaiser volunteered the statement that the future of the British Army lay in the expansion of the Militia; that in view of their great services they should be allowed to organise under their own Inspector General, with their own artillery, transport, and medical services, etc. There cannot, I think, be any indiscretion in saying that His Majesty informed me that he had caused a plan to be prepared by the General Staff of the German Army, and this plan had been submitted to the King. It would be interesting to know whether the German plan for the expansion of the Militia is in the archives of the War Office, and if so, whether there is any objection to its publication

Yes, we should all like to see this document. Apparently it was not favourably received. It may be that Mr. Haldane, in spite of his own military studies in Germany, fears the Greeks even when bearing gifts. Or it may be that the German General Staff, though it knows so much, did not know adequately some of the difficulties in the way of reorganising the Militia—including that of first catching your militiaman.

In all directions one hears lamentations over the extinction of the Militia, and they will probably get louder and more angry as time goes on. Personally, I sympathise with such feelings, up to a point, having favoured the adoption of the Militia as the nucleus of the new territorial army. But really the question is more one of names and sentiment than anything else, and therefore of not much concern to anybody but militiamen. In point of fact, Mr. Haldane's Bill—which all interested in the question should read—extinguishes the Volunteers as much as the Militia. Apparently it does not contemplate the preservation of either name. It simply provides (in Section 28) for the transfer of units of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers to the new "Territorial Force." The conditions of training and service are altered, and assimilated for all alike.

Further, such Militia battalions as deserve to be perpetuated, and desire to preserve their identity, seem to have the opportunity of doing so by joining the "Special Reservists," as the Bill calls them, i.e., men of the first line who have not passed through the ranks of the regular army. By doing this, they will in most cases, as I understand it, lose only a part of their official titles, being still "3rd battalions" of their county regiments—a change of name which is no more than the whole of the infantry underwent when Lord Cardwell introduced the territorial designation of regiments.

For all practical purposes the changes proposed by Mr. Haldane seem to affect the Volunteers a good deal more than the Militia, looking at it from the point of view of the individual man. The recruit who joins the new territorial force will be bound to a definite term of service, and will have to put in a good deal more training, and it is to be expected that with improved organisation he will be kept more strictly up to the mark all round. How he will like it is the x in the Haldane problem. The general anticipation seems to be that x will work out as a minus quantity. The following extracts from a letter which I have had from a Volunteer officer give a different view, and encourage a hope that the equation may prove to have a plus value:—

The doubts thrown in your article this week on the probability of Mr. Haldane's Territorial Army ever being seen in the flesh are not flattering to the Volunteers or to the public spirit of the classes from which they are recruited. There are two classes of Volunteers, those who take themselves seriously and those who do not. The former class has increased of late years—so far as my observation goes. At all events, if it has not increased in numbers, it has increased in the disposition to take itself seriously. Every Volunteer knows, of course, that more stringent conditions of service and a higher standard of efficiency drive a certain number of men out of the ranks; but this is due, not so much to disinclination to improve, as to sheer inability to find the necessary time. . . . .

What I think you overlook is that the men who are really keen on the work and desire to make themselves as efficient as possible, have been disgusted and "choked off" in past times by the refusal of the military authorities themselves to take Volunteers seriously. Not only will a change of spirit and policy at the War Office gratify all those Volunteers who mean business, but it will encourage many men to join the new territorial army who have either never joined the Volunteers, or have given up in disgust, simply beause they feel that they are only "playing at soldiers." As you say, one cannot prophesy how any scheme of this kind will work out in practice, but my own expectation is that the new organisation, provided it is worked with tact and energy from headquarters, will have a good effect, and also that the county associations will be able to do great things in encouraging recuiting. I see that Mr. Arnold-Forster thinks the new territorial army will only be the old Volunteers under a new name. As a Volunteer, I think they will be greatly improved in spirit and efficiency; and if they are, and especially if they are relieved from unfair financial burdens, it is much more likely that their numbers will go up than go down.

An officer forwards from India a sample of a batch of circulars sent out by a Bombay firm of a very shady character, and addressed to "Any Officer of the Temperance Lodge," at a certain station. The Indian Post Office considers that it has discharged its duty by shooting them into the officers' mess of an infantry detachment at the place named. It would do its duty much better by refusing to accept matter so addressed, more especially as most of it is of the most offensive and objectionable character, which any properly managed Post Office would refuse to deliver if it knew its nature. Apparently a trade advertiser in India, who does not care for the expense of addressing circulars by means of a directory, can dump a few million circulars into the post addressed to "Anybody, Anywhere," and rely on the Post Office to deliver them separately from house to house.

I heard the other day from Meerut of a case in which a full sergeant of an infantry regiment is struck off all duties in order to serve as a waiter in the coffee shop. Is it not about time that this sort of thing was peremptorily stopped? Even if the rulers of the Army consider it conducive to "efficiency" to take a sergeant from his soldier's work and employ him as a waiter, the wretched taxpayer may well protest against having to give a canteen waiter a sergeant's pay and allowances, and a life pension of 2s. 6d. a day at forty.

Recruits at the R.G.A. Depot, Plymouth, have lately been employed in the afternoon in making a garden for the officers' mess. This is a good illustration of the advantages arrived at by many years of army reform. The recruits like the work, of course. They feel it is just what they wanted when they decided to become soldiers. Their "pals" who have not yet donned the King's uniform envy them, and hasten to enlist. The work itself is just the kind of training to turn out a smart gunner in the shortest time. The officers will benefit directly by it. The country, which pays the bill, sees what intelligence and zeal are now at work to secure "preparedness for war" regardless of all other considerations.

The following edict appeared on March 1 in the regimental orders of the R.G.A., 1st Scottish Sub-District:—

O.C. companies will report to this office not later than March 5, that all trouser pockets of N.C.O.'s and men under their command have been sewn up or removed.

Neglect of this order will entail a regimental entry in the conduct sheet of any N.C.O. or man concerned.

If you want to cause the maximum of annoyance to the men under your command with the minimum of good result from any practical point of view, this seems a good way of attaining your end. I presume that the garments in question are issued by the higher military authorities with pockets in them, and if so the question seems to arise what authority a commanding officer has to order the pockets to be sewn up, and how much further that authority extends in the direction of altering the official pattern of uniform. However that may be, if what is objected to is the practice of carrying the hands in the pockets, it seems a case where teaching would be better done by example than by precept, which, judging from the evidence of eye-witnesses, has not been tried as yet at Leith.

The recent order limiting re-engagement to 10 per cent. of non-commissioned officers and men per battalion was doubtless issued for good reasons, and obviously in a short service army there must be some definite rule of this kind. In the Royal Artillery, however, there is some grumbling because the percentage is calculated on individual batteries instead of on the regiment collectively. Thus a good N.C.O. of one battery, very keen on re-engaging, is forbidden to do so, the 10 per cent. of his battery being already re-engaged, while throughout the whole of the R.F.A. the re-engaged men only number about 7 per cent. This seems unreasonable, and naturally aggravates the annoyance of the man who is compelled to leave against his will, and deprived of the chance of securing a pension for which he has worked hard.

As a natural consequence of this, one hears again of the grievance caused by allowing N.C.O.s to continue their service beyond twenty-one years. A sergeant concerned in the question tells me that there are "hundreds" of staff-sergeants in this position. Possibly that is a liberal estimate, but the number must be considerable. In one battery which has its full 10 per cent. of re-engaged men there are two, and since the 10 per cent. rule was put into force against junior N.C.O.s a third staff-sergeant has been allowed to extend his time beyond twenty-one years. Surely the re-engaged men who have completed their full time and earned their full pensions should be got rid of before men eight or ten years younger. What conceivable justification can there be for keeping a man of forty and getting rid of a man of thirty, who is fully efficient? Of course, it may be said that you are saving prospectively the pension which the younger man might have earned. But in that case you are sacrificing efficiency for cash, and for an infinitesimal saving even at that. The senior man may possibly increase his pension, and at the most he must go in four or five years, and be replaced by a pension-earning N.C.O.

Our mutual friend, Mr. Punch, has developed an alarming martial spirit in his old age. This is no doubt comic, but it does not seem to be accompanied by "clear thinking." Last week he published an excellent cartoon depicting Mr. Haldane as Pygmalion the sculptor invoking the spirit of patriotism. On the opposite page appeared a feeble illustrated jest at the expense of the Yeomanry—not the first of its kind by any means. When the spirit of patriotism responds to Pygmalion's invocation, one result will be that it will no longer be considered funny to "guy" the auxiliary forces.

Admiral Sir Edward Tracey, who died last week at the age of seventy, was a very distinguished officer, and a man of remarkable scientific knowledge. Soon after he entered the Navy he went to the Baltic with Sir Charles Napier's squadron, which engaged in some not very brilliant operations against the Russian naval forces in that region. He was afterwards concerned in various engagements in the East, when employed on the China Squadron. Later on Tracey was at the head of an important naval mission to Japan, and it is mainly through his careful and tactful instruction that the Japanese navy has become what it now is. He afterwards undertook a similar mission to China. Early in the seventies he did good work (when in command of the Spartan) in the suppression of the slave trade on the East Coast of Africa. From 1886 until 1890 he was second in command of the A fleet, and then Admiral-Superintendent at Malta. His last employment was as President of the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, a post for which he was eminently well fitted. He was a most sagacious man, abundantly gifted with common sense, and his advice was often sought both by the Admiralty and by his brother officers.

It seems rather an odd thing that a man who has spent perhaps thirty years in responsible business employment in India or Ceylon, or some other distant part of the Empire, and comes back to England with a pension, should find any difficulty in obtaining work on his return, if he desires it. There are men who desire it, and it is natural that they should, for no man worth his salt cares to sit down at fifty years of age and do nothing for the rest of his life. But a gentleman in this position with whom I was in communication the other day, told me that he finds it quite impossible to obtain any employment, and that he knows many others who have the same experience. I heard the same thing not long ago from a former acquaintance lately returned on pension, after having been many years a bank manager in India—a man, I suppose, just turned fifty. This is not the old story of "too old at forty." The men I speak of are in the prime of life for business, and in this country would only just be reaching their full salary-earning powers. At the same time they have extensive foreign experience, which ought to be very useful in many businesses, and, being pensioned, they do not require extravagant pay.

One of the Rangoon papers has lately published some much-needed protests against the frequency with which corporal punishment is inflicted upon prisoners in the Burma gaols. The magistrates are very apt to order floggings for quite trivial offences, a typical case of the kind being a sentence of "twenty stripes" which was recently passed upon a club servant in Rangoon for stealing whisky to the value of four annas. Even more abominable, however, than the ferocity of such sentences upon convicted criminals is the not uncommon practice of flogging untried prisoners—prisoners who may therefore turn out to be innocent—for alleged breaches of the gaol regulations. In one recent case the hearing of a charge against a prisoner had to be postponed because he was suffering from the effects of a flogging that he had received whilst awaiting his trial. It appeared that this prisoner made an accusation against a fellow-prisoner, and that the superintendent of the gaol, after inquiring into the matter, condemned him to thirty lashes on the ground that the accusation was false.

No doubt it is requisite that there should be means of maintaining discipline among untried as well as convicted prisoners; but it assuredly ought not to be in the power of a superintendent of a gaol to award any prisoner, tried or untried, such a terrible punishment as thirty lashes except after an independent judicial investigation of the facts. The brutality of the treatment of this man is not an isolated occurrence. The flogging of unconvicted prisoners in the sacred cause of discipline has indeed been carried to such lengths in Burma that more than once the result has been fatal. To the present Secretary of State for India these barbarities must, I am sure, be intensely repellent, and it is to be hoped that he will have steps taken to put an end to a system which is a standing disgrace to British rule.

One of the new machines which the Post Office uses for cancelling stamps on envelopes seems to be doing its work rather too thoroughly. A reader forwards some envelopes on which not only has the stamp been cancelled, but the name of the addressee of the letter has been struck through, the cancelling marks (with the "London, E.C." time and date stamp twice repeated) going right across the upper part of the envelope. From the official point of view this appears to be a stupid arrangement, inasmuch as the partial obliteration of the name must give extra trouble to the postman. From the point of view of the public it is also objectionable, for through the name or such endorsements as "personal" or "private" being more or less hidden, mistakes may be made in the opening of letters.

No one need regret that it has been found impossible to provide the L.C.C. with an ornamental chairman, selected from outside ad hoc. It is far better that the business of the Council should be directed by a working member with long practical experience, especially when the great majority of Councillors have got to learn their work from the beginning. Mr. H. P. Harris, the new Chairman, is one of the oldest members of the Council, a hard worker, and thoroughly respected by all parties. No one who knows the L.C.C. from within will grudge him his elevation to the chair, and the Moderates ought to think themselves lucky in having such a good man for the post.

Apropos of the pending elections of Boards of Guardians, Mr. J. Theodore Dodd writes to urge the importance of returning candidates who are in favour of granting adequate outdoor relief to the deserving aged poor where practicable. "Until old age pensions can be obtained, this," he says, "is far better than offering to the veterans of industry a painful choice between the workhouse and starvation, or at least destitution." No doubt a great many people will sympathise with this view, but I have not the least hope that their sympathy will receive practical expression at the poll. Here and there some little interest is excited by the triennial election of guardians, but in the vast majority of unions, especially in London, it is passed by entirely unnoticed. The same men are returned unopposed time after time, and when a contest does arise it is disregarded—probably not even heard of—by seventy-five per cent. of the ratepayers.

With regard to the statement in last week's Truth as to rates having risen in certain metropolitan boroughs notwithstanding the victories of "municipal reformers" last November, one of my readers in Lewisham points out that the statement is not fair as regards that borough, his account of the matter being, as I understand it, that the rate for the year was made by the old council and is called up by quarterly instalments. The third instalment was 1s. 11d., and the fourth 2s., and the difference is the alleged rise of 1d. I know nothing of the facts, having only taken the statement from one of the penny papers. If the above account is correct, it is clearly not fair to charge the new council with having raised the rates; though it would be fair to say that nothing has been done to reduce them. But the "Moderates" seem to be in a hopeless minority on the Lewisham Council.

There has been some discussion in the Borough on the question whether a hop merchant who is a J.P. is disqualified from acting on a licensing committee by reason of the fact that he sells hops to brewers who are owners of licensed premises and of properties for which new licences are sought. It is thought in some quarters that membership of the Licensing Committee is likely to give a hop merchant an undue advantage over his rivals in the trade—at any rate, in the division or county for which he is a J.P. The point has been submitted to the learned editor of The Justice of the Peace, and his answer is as follows:—

> In our opinion he has not such an interest as will disqualify him. It seems to us that his interest is too small and too remote to affect his position.

Too small and too remote! I fancy this must be a little bit of delicate irony on the part of the legal oracle—a veiled allusion to the circumstance that hops are now a negligible quantity in the ingredients with which beer is brewed.

WOMEN'S SIZE IN HATS.

(Suggested by a recent incident in the Divorce Court.)

So women have no size in hats.
The fact a light instructive sheds
On something else besides, and that 's
Th' adaptiveness of women's heads.

For woman's head is small, or big,
Or middle-sized, or dark, or fair,
According to her style of w—,
I beg the ladies' pardon—hair.

Now when a tile the male-man buys—
Say, Dick, or Harry, Tom, or Ned—
He needs must buy it of the size
To fit his own especial head.

But Chloe knows a better plan.
Her headwear's size, what matters that,
When, at a pinch, she always can Make up her head to fit her hat?

Mr. Justice Pickford, who succeeds Lord Justice Kennedy in the King's Bench Division, first made his reputation at Liverpool, and was for some time the leader of the Northern Circuit. It is only of late years that he has migrated altogether to London, where he has enjoyed a large practice of the most lucrative kind, though not of the kind that makes a barrister's name known to the man in the street. He is the type of man of whom the best judges are made, and his promotion to the Bench is universally approved. All Lord Loreburn's judicial appointments have been admirable, and agreeably free from those indirect motives which, before his time, had almost become a tradition of the Lord Chancellor's office.

In the March number of the National Review Mr. Churton Collins has a very forcible article on the Edalji case. Here and there he has fallen into trifling mistakes of fact, as is almost inevitable in telling a long and complicated story extending over fifteen years, and collected from various detached sources. There were one or two passages in the first Truth articles on the case which would require correction by the light of fuller knowledge if I were telling the story again now. I mention this because those who are concerned to uphold the conviction and burke inquiry may lay hold of such slips to discredit Mr. Edalji's case. But as a matter of fact they all relate to trifling details, and in no way affect the general argument. Mr. Collins's article is welcome and useful because he is known to the public as a clear-headed man, who makes rather a hobby of analysing evidence in obscure cases, and he approaches the Edalji case without any personal interest or prepossession. The conclusion that he arrives at is precisely that arrived at under precisely similar conditions by myself, by Sir Conan Doyle, and, I believe, by everybody capable of weighing evidence who has applied an unbiassed mind to the facts.

The strongest remarks that have yet been made in public on this case come from rather an unexpected quarter—namely, the Police Review. Discussing, in its issue of March 8, the latest proceedings of the Home Secretary in reference to Mr. Edalji, that journal observes:—

> The exposures in the Beck case of Home Office misconduct, and our experiences in the Rolls case, fully justify the conclusion, which this announcement of secret inquiry confirms, that it is designed to hush up the Edalji case. Justice and reparation may possibly be obtained for Mr. Edalji himself without the dreaded exposures, but the public interest will be betrayed and sacrificed by its most responsible servant. . . . The knowledge that a Secretary of State may be depended upon to avoid the exposure of misconduct on the part of Crown officials will conduce to the repetition of miscarriages of justice. Repeated miscarriages will be sure to occur so long as these things can be done in secret, and so long as his Majesty's principal officer of State will have the hardihood to maintain the traditions of foul play by his repeated declarations that the secret reports submitted to him are strictly confidential, and that they cannot be seen or known to the victim most deeply concerned. . . .

I do not quote further, because there is yet a faint hope that the observations are premature. As explained by Sir Conan Doyle in Monday's Daily Telegraph, the private inquiry now being held extends to other matter in the possession of the Home Office besides the official dossier. There is, therefore, a possibility that the committee which is examining the documents may obtain sufficient insight into the case to advise the Home Secretary that a more thorough and public investigation of the case is imperatively necessary.

Although Mr. Justice Grantham would perhaps have been justified in stopping Mrs. Tewksbury's action against Messrs. Maple at the close of the plaintiff's case, it was much better that the issue should be left to the jury. Their verdict showed that in their opinion the defendants did take all reasonable precautions before instituting the proceedings, in respect of which the plaintiff claimed damages for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. Messrs. Maple are to be congratulated on the result, which is, moreover, of considerable importance to the commercial community generally. As the judge remarked, no firm directing a prosecution could have taken more care to be rightly guided, and if damages had been awarded to the plaintiff in the circumstances disclosed at the trial the setting of the criminal law in motion would have become a risk almost too serious for any tradesman to incur.

Apropos of the recent Truth article on "The Alien in Bankruptcy," my attention has been called to the recent bankruptcy of a Mr. Aaron Bagel, boot manufacturer, of Commercial-road. This debtor, a Polish Jew by birth, has been in England for a long time, and prior to his failure had been in business on his own account at different addresses for seventeen years. The accounts presented at the first meeting of creditors on February 27 showed a deficiency of £10,068 18s. 4d., the assets being valued at only £760. The notable feature in this case, as in those dealt with in my previous article, is the huge pile of liabilities contracted by a small trader, who had originally started with only £200 capital. Another feature of resemblance between this and so many other cases is that the debtor's wife is carrying on another business in the same road, started last year, although the debtor states that he did not provide any capital for the purpose. The debtor himself carried on business at this second address prior to 1905, when he sold it to one Barnett. Barnett became bankrupt a year later, after which the present debtor's wife, Mrs. Bagel, commenced operations on the same spot.

Mr. Lloyd-George has just received, I believe, or is just about to receive, a deputation from the leather trade on the subject of these East-End bankruptcies. It is to be hoped that he will appreciate the need of prompt measures to abate these scandals, as well as others arising out of the defects of the present bankruptcy laws. A fact which I heard on good authority the other day ought to be brought to his notice. It is now generally understood by these enterprising aliens —if they have not discovered it for themselves it is promptly impressed upon them by the solicitors whom they consult when they meditate invoking the kindly assistance of the Court—that the first essential to the performance of the operation without risk is to make away with everything in the shape of liquid assets before putting the bankruptcy law in motion. The reason for this is that it reduces the risk of prosecution to a minimum. If the assets included enough cash to pay the cost of proceedings, the creditors might be vindictive enough to employ it for that purpose; but neither they nor the official receivers are likely to find the money themselves. This explains the state of destitution to which the debtor is apparently reduced in so many of these cases when the official receiver takes possession. It also shows the importance of making some provision for the punishment of offences against the Bankruptcy Acts otherwise than at the expense of the creditors.

I have received from the Rev. William Earle a very lengthy communication, in reference to the recent remarks in Truth on his bankruptcy. The substance of it is that he has received no pecuniary benefit from his extensive dealings in real estate, and he seems to think that this is a sufficient answer to the Registrar's decision to suspend his discharge on the ground of "rash and hazardous speculation." If that is his view, I have no objection to put it on record, but I really feel under no obligation to discuss it.

Is it not about time that we abolished the Lottery Acts? The present state of things, at any rate, seems to me to be nothing better than a piece of national hypocrisy. On the one hand, we more or less rigorously prevent the promotion of lotteries in England. On the other, we allow the English Post Office to be used as an agency for the promotion of lotteries on the Continent or in Ireland. In the past week or so there has been another huge distribution in the United Kingdom of lottery circulars emanating from firms at Buda-Pesth, one of whom—repeating a dodge that has been practised on former occasions—had its circulars posted at Alexandria because the postage is less from Egypt than from Hungary. There has also been a distribution on a smaller scale of books of tickets for a "Derby sweep" organised by the Newry Rowing Club, and for "a drawing of prizes" (otherwise a lottery) in connection with St. Peter's Church Bazaar, Philsboro', Dublin. In the latter case it is announced that the drawing—an illegal proceeding even in Ireland, though the law is not enforced there—will take place in the presence of the Lord Mayor or the High Sheriff.

As I understand, the Lottery Acts were passed to protect the community from what was regarded as a demoralising system of gambling—a system, too, that is easily employed for the purpose of fraud. Such protection is certainly needed, and I could point out directions in which the law might advantageously be extended for the suppression of methods of other gambling that are also to a large extent methods of fraud. But it is a manifest absurdity that the State, while virtuously putting down lotteries in England, should make itself a party through the Post Office to the sale here of tickets in lotteries got up in Germany, or Austria Hungary, or Ireland. I know that the Postmaster-General says that he has no power to intercept circulars enclosed in sealed envelopes. But he could obtain power to do so, and unless some action of the kind is taken, the Lottery Acts might, as I have suggested, just as well be abolished—indeed, if people are to be permitted to engage in this form of gambling it is better that they should lose their money here than send it off to Buda-Pesth or Homburg.

In a prosecution under the Street Betting Act at Wigan the other day a detective deposed that he saw the defendant pay money to two men in a public lavatory and to a third man in the street. The defendant, who was known to the police as a street bookmaker, had nearly £50 in cash in his possession, but no papers. A sagacious alderman named Gee inquired whether he would be arrested if he were seen in the same position paying money to men. The Chief Constable pointed out that there was an essential difference between the two cases, inasmuch as his worship was not a bookmaker. But the use of such a place as that mentioned in the evidence for the purpose of making payments would be at least a suspicious proceeding even on the part of an alderman of Wigan, and, seeing what the defendant's occupation was, the Bench took a very indulgent course in letting him off.

One of the dodges of a certain class of furniture dealers called forth some unfavourable criticism from Judge Edge in the Clerkenwell County Court the other day. The defendant in the action was attracted by an advertisement in the daily papers of second-hand furniture, "a wonderful bargain for young marrying couple," stored for convenience of selling at a depository, where inquirers should "ask to see Madame ——'s goods." The goods really belonged to a furnishing company, and on finding that the advertisement was being repeated after he had made his purchases, the defendant refused to take any of the furniture except a drawing-room suite, which his solicitor described as "the decoy one." In giving a verdict for the defendant on another ground, the Judge took the opportunity of observing that, while the plaintiffs had doubtless some of the goods from the lady mentioned in the advertisement, "he could not help thinking that the object of such advertisements was to create a false impression." This seems to be quite obvious, and under such false impressions people every day buy furniture at prices which make it anything but the bargain they imagine it to be. In this instance the goods were at a depository, but, as I have repeatedly shown, an even commoner version of the same trick of the trade is to get up a bogus sale by auction at a house temporarily rented for the purpose.

A typical example of the bloodsucking methods of the notorious Darlow family, otherwise the London and County Loan Co., was recently given in the Sheffield County Court when a working man borrower sought relief from a hard and unconscionable bargain. The amount received by the borrower was £1 19s. 6d. He had paid back £10 18s. 9d. (including £2 14s. 5d. for court fees) but he still owed £5 1s. 9d. on the last promissory note that he had given. The interest charged worked out at the rate of about 650 per cent., and the Judge had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the whole transaction was harsh and unconscionable within the meaning of the Moneylenders Act. His Honour accordingly made an order relieving the borrower from any further payment, and cancelling the promissory note.

This case supplies another illustration of the scandal arising from the abuse of the jurisdiction of the Record Court of the Hundred of Salford. The transaction took place at Sheffield, where the Darlows and the borrower live. When, however, the latter got into arrear with his payments it was in the Salford Hundred Court that the Darlows sued him, and as he was without the means to journey to Manchester (where the court sits), judgment was obtained against him in his absence. It was in respect of this judgment that he had to pay the above-mentioned £2 14s. 5d. for court fees. For some years past it has been a common dodge of a number of sharks of the Darlow breed to employ the processes of the Salford Hundred Court against small debtors residing at a distance from Manchester, and it is high time that a stop was put to that practice. The existence of this court nowadays is an anachronism. It should either be abolished altogether, or else be so reformed that it can no longer be used in this illegitimate and oppressive manner.

A so-called charity, styled "Pastor Black's Orphanage," came under the notice of the Liverpool City Bench a few days ago, when a young woman, named Callaway, was charged under the Vagrancy Act with begging, and Charles Black (the "Pastor") was charged with aiding and abetting her. Callaway was employed by Black as a paid collector. It was shown by the police that she was begging from door to door, and that she stated that there were fifty children in the orphanage, whereas the number was only ten. These ten children had their food in the cellar, and the best rooms in the house were occupied "by the people responsible for the mission." The prosecution was instituted by the Chief Constable, because he had come to the conclusion that the orphanage was in reality a commercial concern, run for the benefit of the defendant Black and those who assisted him.

The Bench, though they said they "did not like this sort of thing," came to the conclusion that the defendants could not be convicted under the Vagrancy Act—a decision presumably due to the fact that a few children are kept at the "orphanage" as a sort of stock in trade. This is a device which unfortunately enables many a charity-monger to snap his fingers at the law and continue year after year what is practically a fraudulent imposition on the public. The law with respect to this form of mendicancy needs to be strengthened. Meanwhile, it is to be hoped that the statements of the police in the above prosecution will show people, in Liverpool and elsewhere, that "Pastor Black's Orphanage" is utterly undeserving of support.

My Legal Pillory this week is particularly rich in examples of the punishment accorded to the unfortunate persons who have been guilty of the crime of poverty. Six weeks' hard labour is considered by the Littlehampton magistrates none too much punishment for the pauper who refuses to do her allotted task at the workhouse. An aged pauper whose hands are crippled is sent to gaol for fourteen days by the Dunmow Bench because he refuses to pick oakum. The Selly Oak's magistrates give a beggar three months' imprisonment, while the West Hartlepool worthies have no hesitation about sending an unfortunate labourer who was tempted by hunger to help himself to an inexpensive breakfast, to gaol for a month, even though this was his first offence. In the same category is the case reported from the Bishop's Castle Bench. I am utterly unable to understand the infliction of a fine of £5 for the crime of sleeping out. Even if this sentence is an error of the reporter or the printer the apprehension of a man who has just escaped conviction, and his prompt consignment to gaol, looks very much like persecution. There remains two other noteworthy cases. The fine of half-a-crown by the King's Heath magistrates upon the fashionably-dressed woman, who tore handfuls of hair from the head of a little girl under her charge, is absurdly lenient, while to send a man to gaol for representing himself as destitute while he had 7½d. in his possession, as was done by the possessors of aristocratic titles who sit on the Kettering Bench, is equally ridiculous.

Epsom Petty Sessions. Before Sir W. Vincent, Colonel Lambert, and Messrs. Rostron, Langlands, and Wootten. W. J. Saitch, charged with assaulting his wife. He knocked her down and kicked her. Fined 10s. and costs.

Epsom Petty Sessions. Before the same bench. Douglas G. Gilmour, charged with driving a motor cycle at the rate of nine or ten miles an hour. Fined £5 and £3 for failing to stop when called upon to do so.

Glasgow Southern Police-court. Thomas Little, charged with assaulting his mother, a frail old woman. He struck her on the face, knocked her down, and kicked her. Fined £3 3s.

St. Rollox Police-court. Before Bailie Edward Guest. Allan Cameron, charged with stealing four brass bushes from the premises where he was employed. Sixty days' imprisonment.

West Riding Police-court. Before Mr. H. Pigott and eight other magistrates. James Atkinson, charged with assaulting Mrs. Clara Saunderson. He made an appointment to give her information about her husband, who is in Canada, and attempted to assault her, dragging her along the road, and tearing her clothing in the effort. Fined 40s. and costs

West Riding Police-court. Before the same bench. Seth Stephenson, charged with leaving a traction engine unattended on the high road for ten minutes. Fined 20s. and costs.

Clay Cross Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Jackson and Mr. E. Tinkler. Mary Vincent, charged with stealing a pair of boots. Twenty-one days' hard labour.

Oswestry Petty Sessions. Before Dr. Aylmer Lewis and Mr W. H. Plimmer. John Thomas, innkeeper, charged with cruelty to a pony. He beat it most brutally with the butt-end of a whip. The animal's body was covered with weals. Fined £1 and costs.

Dunmow Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Clapham, Worrin, and Major Lowndes. David Reeve, an aged inmate of the Dunmow Workhouse, charged with refusing to perform a punishment task of oakum-picking, because his hands were crippled with rheumatic gout. Fourteen days.

Govan Police-court. Before Bailie Neilson. Edwin Williams, charged with assaulting a girl of fifteen. He entered the shop in which she was temporarily in charge and attempted to assault her. When she called for assistance he struck her several times on the face and mouth. Fined £3 3s.

Kinross Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff - Substitute J. Dean Leslie. John Bruce, Richard White, and Thomas B. Close, miners, charged with night-poaching on a private road on the Blairadam estate. Forty days' imprisonment each with hard labour.

Lochgelly Police-court. Before Provost Garry. A. Walker, charged with assaulting E. Harvey by butting him and kicking him in a vital part. Harvey was unconscious for half an hour. Fined £2.

Mansfield Police-court John Tomlinson, charged with ill-treating his three children. All of them showed marks of severe beating, and, when arrested, defendant admitted that he had given one of them "some of this belt," on which there was a buckle. Bound over to come up for judgment.

Newbury Police-court. Before the Mayor and Messrs. Hemsted, Jackson, Long, Lewendon, and Hickman. S. Marshall and A. Garrett, charged with an unprovoked assault on J. Pike. Because he had not a light when the two men asked him for one. Pike was knocked about and his arm broken. Marshall fined £1, Garrett £2.

King's Heath Police-court Before Mr. C. P. Lane and other magistrates. A fashionably dressed single woman named Gertrude Isabel Allbutt, charged with assaulting a girl four years of age, who was under her care. When drunk she dragged the child along by the hair and struck her. There were bald patches on the head, and the scalp was much bruised. Fined 2s. 6d. and costs.

Market Rasen Police-court. Before Messrs. W. J. Clarke and B. Hardy. John Collins, charged with cruelty to a dog. He bashed it on the pavement, smashing its leg. The animal had to be destroyed. Fined £2 and costs.

Bishop's Castle Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. F. Plowden and H. B. Whitaker. F. Martin, liberated the day previously at the Shropshire Assizes, charged with sleeping out. Fined £5, or, in default, fourteen days' hard labour.

Cannock Police-court. John Baugh and T. Shuter, charged with poaching. They were caught with two baskets in their possession containing twelve live rabbits and two nets. One month each.

Selly Oak Police-court. Before Messrs. Lyndon, Tomson, Jones, and Bayliss. W. J. Venn, charged with begging. Three months' hard labour.

Kettering County Bench. Before Messrs. J. A. Gotch, Stockburn, de Crespigny, Sartoris, Preston, Summer, H. G. Gotch, and Captain Heycock. George West, labourer, charged with attempting to obtain lodgings in the casual ward on the plea of destitution, having at the time 7½d. in his possession. Seven days' hard labour.

Abingdon County Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. B. H. Morland, W. Dockar-Drysdale, and M. Brewer. Agnes Cross, an eccentric woman, charged with absconding from the workhouse. One month's imprisonment.

Littlehampton Petty Sessions. Elizabeth Moore and Henry Hamblin, charged with refusing to do their allotted task at the East Preston Workhouse. Six weeks' hard labour each.

West Hartlepool Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. W. Barber, a labourer, charged with stealing a breakfast from a man at work in a shipyard. He was out of work and had nothing to eat. A first offence. One month's hard labour.

In Mr. Justice Purcell the Gold Coast Colony evidently possesses a Draco of the most relentless type. Recently at the Assizes at Tarkwa a sergeant in the mines police and four confederates pleaded guilty to a theft of £300 from the Bibiani mines. Mr. Justice Purcell condemned the sergeant to twenty years, one of his confederates to fifteen years, and the other three to seven years' imprisonment; and, in addition, ordered that each of them should be flogged twice. No doubt it was a serious offence, calling for severe punishment, but these sentences exhibit a degree of unreasoning ferocity such as one would scarcely expect from a British judge.

A piece of crass stupidity on the part of the police was revealed at a case heard at the West Riding Court last week. Two boys, aged twelve and thirteen, were playing at Red Indians, and had erected a cardboard wigwam in a field. To heighten the illusion they borrowed a couple of lamps from some adjoining property, whereupon they were arrested and locked up all night in the cells as a preliminary to being brought before the magistrates on a charge of theft. The magistrates let them off with a reprimand in view of their having been locked up all night. The reprimand might have been much better addressed to the officials responsible for the arrest. To treat a couple of youngsters guilty of a mere boyish prank as if they were a couple of ferocious ruffians whom it would be dangerous to the community to leave at large for a few hours could only suggest itself to a mind steeped in policemanism.

In commenting last week upon a vaccination exemption case at Southport I assumed that two of the magistrates, Dr. Earnshaw and Dr. Arthur Wood, were medical men. It appears that this was a mistake, Dr. Earnshaw being a doctor of music, but that fact only makes all the more surprising his refusal to give the conscientious objector the certificate to which he was clearly entitled. The same objector has, by the way, since repeated his application to a different Bench, who at once granted it, one of the magistrates being a solicitor, who pointed out that it was their duty to administer the law. Obviously a legal training is a better qualification for the Bench than a knowledge of music.

A trickster named H. Edwards, 137, St. Alban's-avenue, Chiswick, is still practising the mean imposition on poor people for which I pilloried him in November, 1905. He advertises in the newspapers an offer to forward particulars to persons desiring to secure situations as stewards, clerks, butchers, bakers, stokers, etc., on Atlantic liners. Those who apply for these "particulars" get in reply a circular in which Edwards invites a payment of one shilling for "full instructions how to proceed to obtain" one of "these very remunerative and attractive berths," in which many men have "cleared between £150 and £200" during a season of about five months. All that the victims receive in return for their shilling, however, is a small pamphlet on "occupations afloat," in which they are informed that if they want such berths they must apply to the shipping companies and "take their chance with others who apply." Edwards words his first circular so ingeniously that I fear he could not be successfully prosecuted for obtaining money by false pretences, but morally, if not legally, he is committing that offence, and it is a disgrace to the press that his misleading advertisements should be inserted in so many newspapers.

One of the latest additions to my list of Yankee medicos with specifics for various complaints is N. Tucker, M.D., Mt. Gilead, Ohio, U.S.A., who is represented over here by A. Q. Tucker, of "Onaway," Half-moon-lane, Herne Hill, S.E. The Tuckers present an asthma specific to the asthmatic public for £3, this including an atomizer and 4 oz. of an inhalant. As a very good atomizer can be purchased at any chemist's shop for 3s. 6d., the charge for the treatment on the face of it seems exorbitant. Some people even describe it in much stronger terms. Dr. F. J. Waldo, the City coroner, for instance, in the course of an inquest held at the beginning of the year upon a labourer who died from consumption, and who had been dosing himself with "Dr." Tucker's specific, stigmatised this kind of dealing as a fraud.

Business men frequently write to ask me whether I know anything of the "Institute W. Schimmelpfeng" and what I think about it. Their inquiries are generally the result of having been requested by the I.W.S. to fill up an inquisitorial form, with full particulars of their business—its history, the names of the partners, the amount of their capital, their turnover, and so on. It seems not unnatural that a request of this kind from a perfect stranger—having no motive except to facilitate the stranger's own business—should be resented as a gross impertinence; but as this is not the opinion of the firm of Schimmelpfeng, they will have no objection to my putting to them the following questions. I have modelled them, with a few trifling alterations which I regard as improvements, upon the catechism which the Institute W. Schimmelpfeng uses:—

1. Since when has the Schimmelpfeng business been established? Who was W. Schimmelpfeng? Did he always pay 20s. in the £.?

2. Who is the present proprietor or partners? Since when? Antecedents? (Anything in the nature of what the firm of Stubbs calls "registered information" should be inserted under this head.)

3. Description of business (modus operandi, number of customers, average bank balance, etc., etc.). If a limited company, a copy of the last annual report and balance sheet is desirable

4. Present capital? Are the business premises the firm's property?

5. Special remarks: (Insert here such information as will enable the Editor of Truth to answer any possible inquiry about the Institute.

6. References who can substantiate all the previous statements.

7. Bankers.

I may add that it is important for my business that this form should be filled up and returned at an early date.

In reference to Reuben May's latest appeal, noticed in a recent issue of Truth, a gentleman who had been favoured with it tells me that he wrote in reply asking May to send him a balance-sheet and the name of his bankers. His letter was not even answered. Reuben does not think it worth while to waste a postage stamp on a possible subscriber who wants information about his financial administration. Of course, he would not send a balance-sheet, it being against his principles to issue accounts of the money he collects; but I presume he has to employ a banker, to whom he might have referred his inquirer.

May has lately been issuing a new postcard appeal about once a fortnight. In one of the last he states that he is relieving "over 10,000" people a week; but he does not say what he has spent on the printing and postage of these appeals. As for his "over 10,000"—which means nearly 1,500 a day—I believe the figure to be a guess inspired by a morbid imagination. But whatever the correct figure may be, the people dealt with are mostly of the loafer class, for whom the casual ward is the proper place, and though his operations draw crowds from all the adjoining regions of London, I do not suppose he could show that he feeds fifty people a day who have any genuine claim upon charity.

With reference to my paragraph last week, Messrs. Morris and Calder write:—

> We very much regret that you should have thought it necessary to call us over the coals in your issue of 6th inst. If you will refer to our rules (copy of which we enclose), you will see by No. 18 that we take every precaution to avoid doing business with minors, and although we have carefully searched our lists of names and addresses of sportsmen, we cannot find anything to indicate that they include any infants or members of universities, colleges, or schools.

They had better search again, for I fancy one of the lists must have been overlooked. It is, at any rate, a fact that a large number of men at Oxford, including minors, received circulars from this firm of touting bookmakers, and, as I pointed out, they have clearly rendered themselves liable to a prosecution under Lord Herschell's Act. The sending of a betting circular to a minor is an offence in itself, whether any business is transacted or not, and the fact that the firm requires intending clients to state that they are over 21, would be no defence to the charge. I may add that even if none of the circulars had been addressed to youths actually under age I should still have called Messrs. Morris and Calder over the coals, because I consider that the distribution of such incitements to betting—more especially at a university—is a reprehensible proceeding. I observe that these people, like most of the fraternity to which they belong, talk about their lists of "sportsmen." Of course, a backer of horses is not necessarily a sportsman, nor—thank goodness—is a sportsman necessarily a backer of horses.

Matilda Bernstein, a female Shylock plying her nefarious business in Birmingham and Shrewsbury, found a Daniel come to judgment at the Shrewsbury County-court last week. A bricklayer was sued by Matilda for £12 10s., the balance due on a promissory note. Seeing that the defendant had already been fleeced in a most outrageous manner, Judge Harris Lea decided to revise the terms of the transaction under the provisions of the Moneylenders Act. He directed that an account should be taken on the basis of allowing the plaintiff interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum on the amount that she had actually advanced. It was ascertained that on this basis Matilda, instead of receiving £12 10s., would have to repay £4 14s. to the bricklayer, and his Honour made an order accordingly. An excellent example of the biter being bit.

In another case, also at Shrewsbury, the public examination of a bankrupt tradesman revealed the fact that in return for a loan of £28 from the notorious Wolfe Jackson, a Manchester moneylender, he had already paid back £45 10s., but still owed £57 14s. 4d. The Official Receiver said that he proposed to deal with Jackson's claim under the Moneylenders Act, and I trust that the matter will come before Judge Harris Lea.

"Having a large amount of capital lying idle and being desirous of extending our clientèle," "Cox and Co.," 229, Seven Sisters-road, N., are now diligently circularising London schoolmasters and their assistants with an offer of cash accommodation from £20 to £10,000. There are many poorly-paid members of the scholastic profession to whom such an offer is peculiarly tempting, but if they take my advice they will avoid "Cox and Co." as they would the plague. The name is really an alias masking the identity of one of the brothers Whiteman, the rapacious and unprincipled blood-suckers whose nefarious practices as "Seymour and Whiteman" have frequently been exposed in the law courts and the press.

By the way, "Cox and Co." themselves would have come in for a nasty exposure last week if the daily papers had not for some inexplicable reason omitted the name of the firm from the reports of a case at the Clerkenwell County-court. The reports in question gave extracts from some letters which the plaintiffs, described simply as "a firm of moneylenders," had written to the defendant, an insurance clerk, threatening to inform his employers unless he complied with their demands immediately. The Judge characterised the letters as "improper," but that seems to be too mild a word to apply to these usurers' methods of putting the screw on their wretched victims.

For the first time within my recollection, Mr. E. P. Phillips, who has so frequently come under notice in these columns, has brought out a number of his Railway Supplies Journal. This is doubtless to protect himself against a repetition of the unpleasant experience which he incurred two or three years ago from the arm of the law in consequence of obtaining payments in advance for articles in this publication. The copy in my possession, which is dated January, 1907, bears no number, but describes the Railway Supplies Journal as having been established in 1872. Phillip has been at the game longer than I supposed. The only remarkable thing about this production is that a brewery company and fourteen proprietors of patents should have paid Phillips for articles in it. According to the scale hitherto in force the price is only 10s., but the copies have to be bought and distributed before they can be of any use as an advertisement, and even then it is an advertisement which any person of ordinary intelligence would rather pay to escape.

Another case has lately come under my notice exemplifying the foolishness of ordering directories from unknown firms, working through canvassers or postal advertisements. The victims in this instance are clergymen, who, in the latter part of 1905, paid for an "Illustrated Clerical Directory," which was to have been issued, at the price of 25s., by the Church, School, and Estate Agency, Limited, then located at 6, The Sanctuary, Westminster. The directory has never been issued, and the money paid has never been returned. Nor is it likely that it ever will be. When I first heard of the case, I discovered the company at Parliament Chambers,

Great Smith-street, but before my representative had succeeded in finding any representative of the firm at the office, the company had again migrated, and where it has gone to I cannot discover.

Closely connected with the Church, School, and Estate Agency, Limited, was another company called the Illustrated Directories, Limited. A parson who paid his money to the first company received an answer from the second when he wrote to inquire about his directory, and both names were on the office door at Great Smith-street. A gentleman styled the Rev. T. E. Forbes-Jones, B.A., seems to have been the presiding genius of both companies. One of the cheques sent to the Church, School, and Estate Agency, Limited, to pay for a directory is endorsed "T. E. Forbes-Jones, Principal." The Illustrated Directories, Limited, was registered in January, 1906. Its object was described to be to acquire from the Rev. T. E. Forbes-Jones all rights and interests in a directory then being compiled by him, and he was appointed permanent editor of the company's publications at £500 per annum. A winding-up order was made against the company last October. The name of T. E. Forbes-Jones is not to be found in the clergy lists, and if the gentleman is a minister of a "Free Church" it seems very unbecoming that he should prey in this way upon his brethren of the Establishment. I am curious to know more of him.

Mr. Dudley Salt, of Herne Bay, is still busily pushing his beautiful scheme for getting "Back to the Land for 1 lb. of Tea," and I am constantly receiving inquiries about it. I can only repeat what has already been said in Truth. Salt appears to have got some land, of sorts, and as he publishes grateful acknowledgments from parties to whom plots have been conveyed, there is no reason to doubt that he is getting rid of his land as well as his tea. The objection to the business is the same which applies to all "premium" trading—the tea is loaded with the price of the land as well as the cost of an expensive system of advertising and agency, and as it is not likely that all the customers will stick to the tea until they become entitled to their plot of land, they would all be better off if they drank somebody else's tea and put the difference in price into the savings bank. If they choose eventually to invest such savings in land, they will probably be able to get something much more to their liking than the Dudley Salt allotments.

Last Friday's papers recorded a meeting of the Street Noise Abatement Committee at the House of Commons under the chairmanship of Sir Alfred Jacoby, to consider a draft Bill for the amendment of the existing Acts dealing with street music, etc. The incident was even paragraphed in the "Political Notes" of the Times. It is not recorded that the assembled committeemen took the opportunity to question Mr. Bowden Green, who was present, respecting the article in last week's Truth on the finances of the Committee; but it is high time that some of them turned their attention to this side of the movement. If it were not for the many names of well-known people that figure on Green's advertisements and circulars, he would not have been able to collect in subscriptions a quarter of the money that has passed through his hands during the last four or five years; and when people's names are used for this purpose an obligation rests on them to see that the money is properly spent and properly accounted for. To all appearance, no one connected with the Committee has ever given a moment's thought to this subject, nor to the precise relation in which Bowden Green stands to his patrons and subscribers.

An advertisement offering "Teeth at Hospital Prices" has been appearing recently in the weekly press, applicants being directed to apply for letters to "Lord Haldon, Honorary Secretary, The Artificial Teeth Aid Society, Ltd., 89, New Oxford-street." I had not heard previously of the Artificial Teeth Aid Society, but from inquiries I have made from Somerset House, I find that this is not surprising, since the Society was only registered on February 7 last with a modest capital of £500. The gentlemen who are responsible for the company's existence include a mining engineer, a perfumer, a traveller, a cutler, an accountant, and a secretary, with not a dentist amongst them. It is stated in the memorandum of association that the object of the Society is to contract with registered dentists to attend in their own homes, or at local dispensaries, patients who shall be nominated by members of, or subscribers to the Society, for nothing, or at a reduced rate.

As yet no return of shareholders has been filed at Somerset House, so that I have been unable to ascertain whether any registered dentists are shareholders in this joint-stock endeavour to supply the public with teeth at hospital prices. The scheme, however, looks very like an ingenious dodge on the part of some worthy dentist or other to reap the advantages of advertising without shocking the sensibilities of his professional brethren. Personally, I have never been able to understand the ethical objection to dentists advertising their businesses in the ordinary way, but I can certainly see very grave objections to this method of getting hold of patients by means of introduction through the medium of mining engineers, perfumers, and cutlers, under the supposition that they will obtain exceptional terms at reduced rates.

I am surprised that Mr. Gibson Bowles's letter to the Chelsea Conservative Association in reply to a request for a subscription has not attracted more attention. He was long a shining light in the Conservative Party, although always retaining a certain amount of independence of judgment and action. The party fund, he says, was over £100,000 not many years ago, and it was at least £500,000 at the last general election, mainly derived from the sale of titles, and he not obscurely hints that in one case £250,000 was paid for a peerage, and £50,000 for a knighthood. According to him, most Conservative candidates pay their own election expenses, and only a small portion of them got a dole of a few hundreds at the last election, unless they happened to be needy Unionists, when it was more considerable. Mr. Bowles, therefore, suggested that as Unionist office holders, during their ten and a half years of office, received a total sum of £1,750,000, the Chelsea Conservative Association, if in want of funds, would do well to apply to these ex-office holders for a contribution.

If people like to subscribe to their party fund, and if the leaders of a party like to help themselves out of these subscriptions to meet their election expenses, these are matters which concern the party alone. As the Unionist Party contains many rich men it will always benefit by this, and this accounts for their persistent opposition to candidates being relieved of the cost of elections. But if what Mr. Bowles says in regard to large sums having been procured for party purposes by the sale of titles is true, this is a national scandal. We are apt to sneer at foreign titles because they can be bought. But we are the only country where not only a title, but the right to sit in one branch of the Legislature, are to be purchased. Some M.P. should make it his business to inquire into these allegations of Mr. Bowles, and unless they are absolutely and officially denied, the matter should be referred to a committee with full powers to examine witnesses.

The cheapest country for buying a title used to be Portugal. When a man is made a baron or a count there, his patent recites the service for which the grant is made. I was once in Portugal, and I had some curiosity to discover what were the services for which an Englishman of my acquaintance had been made a Portuguese Baron. I therefore looked the matter up, and I found that it was for having introduced into the country a new tree. There used to be another plan for becoming a baron. It appears that there is—or was then—a convent which once had large possessions. All its tenants were, by the fact of being tenants, barons. But the convent had lost its possessions with the exception of one farm. It had an agent in London. For a very moderate consideration, the agent let this farm to a would-be tenant. He therefore became a baron; and when he resigned the farm to the next applicant, he retained the title.

At present the cheapest mart of titles is the Papacy. A dukedom costs £5,000, a countship only a few hundreds. In the kingdom of Italy these titles are not officially recognised, as the Pope has ceased to be a territorial sovereignty. But they pass muster socially in Italy, and are recognised outside Italy. Before the King of Sardinia became King of Italy, Count Cavour, being in want of funds, proposed to the Chamber to sell hereditary countships for 10,000 fr. His proposal, however, was not accepted by the Chamber.

Personally, I see no reason why a State should not sell titles, provided that the money goes into the public coffers, and does not convey any legislative rights. Many would buy them, for, apart from the pleasure of being called "my Lord" or "Sir ——," a Peer when impecunious can always find an American young lady reeking of dollars to pay handsomely for being his wife. Thus money is brought into the country. This was the view of Frederick the Great. A Nabob, or an ex-pirate (it was never known what his calling and his nationality had been), named Neal, once visited Berlin in his day, and offered to take up his residence at Berlin if he were made a nobleman and received at Court. Frederick closed at once the bargain, and always particularly prided himself on having done a smart stroke of business.

The three months' visit of the Ameer of Afghanistan to India is a remarkable event, and one naturally wonders what will come of it. Indian Officialdom has exerted itself to give the visitor a good time and impress him favourably; and the length of his stay, even more than the effusive expressions with which he bids the country good-bye, seems to indicate that in both respects the effort has been successful. There is just a danger that it may have been too successful. If the Ameer were so deeply impressed with all that he has seen as to set about Europeanising his own country, he might soon find himself in trouble at home. The same result may follow from his becoming suspected of a desire for too intimate relations with the Indian Government and British officials. The strongest characteristic of the Afghans, so far as we are concerned, is their intense love of their own independence. In spite of all professions of friendship, the average Afghan is bound to cherish a certain suspicion of British designs on his country. It is a risky thing, therefore, for their ruler to profess too warm an affection for his next-door neighbour, or too strong an admiration for men and things British.

Our policy towards the Ameer and his subjects should be to cultivate their confidence rather than to make overtures for their friendship. When they have got to understand that we cherish no secret designs on their independence, they will never be our enemies, as long as we are strong enough to command their respect, and more than this we do not want of them. At the bottom of all our relations with Afghanistan is, of course, the bogey of a Russian invasion of India. The Afghans have no motive for loving Russia more than England. With the history of all their Asiatic neighbours before their eyes, their natural disposition must be to regard both with equal suspicion and unfriendliness. The only motive which could induce them to facilitate the passage of a Russian army through their country is that they have more to fear from Great Britain than Russia. Our business is to disabuse their minds of any such fear, and this can only be done by leaving them severely alone.

The North Tyrone election shows any student of electoral statistics that the gilt is pretty well off the Ministerial gingerbread by this time, and it is astonishing that the Opposition have not been more jubilant over it. A majority of nine has been pulled down to seven—a reduction of over 20 per cent. in twelve months. A few more nasty knocks of this kind, and where will the Government be?

Suppose that females should be sent
To sit and speak in Parliament.
A "talking-shop" it was before;
But with the ladies there——Oh, Lor!

Women's Suffrage has been "talked out" for the present—not altogether an inappropriate fate for it. The speeches on Mr. Dickinson's Bill show, as usual, that there are a certain number of men in the House of Commons who believe that the social advancement and moral elevation of women are in some way connected with their admission to political power. But the general reception and the fate of the Bill show that the overwhelming majority have no such faith in their hearts, even though some of them may have rendered homage to it with their lips.

I said last week that I would endeavour to obtain particulars of the women's petitions against the suffrage now in circulation. One of these was presented to Parliament last week, but I understand that signatures are still being received, and there is no reason why they should not be; on the contrary, it seems highly desirable that every effort should be made to obtain the fullest possible expression of the opinion of the enormous majority of women who are strongly opposed to the movement, and as they are numbered by hundreds of thousands, this must necessarily be a matter of time and labour. Miss E. M. K. Taylor, 30, Hyde Park-street, London, W., is the hon. secretary of this movement, and I would recommend all ladies who desire to "make their voices heard" to communicate with her. The following is the text of the petition or protest:—

We, the undersigned, fully realising the importance and value of Women's Work in our National Life—especially in Education and the care of the Poor—protest against Parliamentary Suffrage being granted to women, believing it would destroy rather than add to their real influence in their own sphere of work in the world.

THE VINDICTIVE FARMER.

A Farmer once a Pony had,
Of Manners most exceeding bad,
Who'd shy, and jib, and plunge, and kick—
In fact, show every vicious Trick.
'Twas vain his Owner lashed and cut,
Nay, gave him e'en the Whip-Stock's Butt;
The more by Stripes he tried to tame,
The worse that stubborn Brute became.
At length, with vengeful Anger rife,
The frantic Farmer drew his Knife:
"Dang 'un, since whipping bean't no Cure,
I'll cut 'un's Hamstrings through, for sure;
And then, I guess, 'tis plain as plain,
He'll never jib nor kick again."
While thus he spake, there chanced to pass
A sober, mild-eyed Quaker Lass,
Who, halting there, surveyed the Scene
With pained and disapproving Mien:
"Thee'lt never, Friend," exclaimed the Maid,
"Use on thy Colt yon cruel Blade?"
"Aye, but I will," the Farmer cried,
As wrathful he his Pony eyed.
"I've stood his Nonsense long enough,
And now I mean the Brute to hough;
For that's the only Means, I says,
To cure 'un of his kicking Ways!"
"Cure!" cried the Lass. "Nay, worthy Friend,
To cure is not to maim, but mend.
If houghed, I own, no more he'll kick,
Nor play thee other vicious Trick;
But neither will he draw thy Cart,
Thus crippled, to the weekly Mart.
In brief, thee'lt kill his Vices, true;
But then, thee'lt kill HIS USES, too!"

While Penal Laws should, doubtless, aim
The Criminal and Rogue to tame,
They so endeavour should to tame him

SCRUTATOR.

PEACE, RETRENCHMENT, AND—THE HAGUE

THE last week's debates on the Naval Estimates have resolved themselves simply into a discussion whether the Navy is or is not stronger to-day, or will or will not be stronger during the coming year, than under the late Government. The spokesmen on the Government side maintain the affirmative proposition, the representatives of the late Government, the negative. Where the truth lies as between the two no man can decide—not even an expert, for the experts disagree, and there is no means by which the question can ever be brought to the test. The average man can, therefore, take little interest in the discussion, nor has he any occasion to, so long as he can see for himself that we have a vastly greater preponderance of naval force over any possible enemy than we have ever had before, and so long as even those who make it their business to "crab" this force scarcely deny that it is equal to those of any two possible enemies. The one question which might be discussed with advantage to the ordinary workaday Briton, the question whether this force is in excess of any national requirement that can be reasonably foreseen, is the one question which no one in the House of Commons seems disposed to raise. The First Lord of the Admiralty, not having yet been heard on the subject in Parliament, took the opportunity when he was speaking at Oxford on Saturday to declare emphatically that the "two-power standard"—now accepted as meaning a two power standard with a handsome percentage over—is being maintained, and will be maintained at all costs; and this seems to be the view of our naval policy most generally accepted.

I have never myself understood on what principle the United Kingdom and the Empire require a greater naval strength in comparison with that of foreign nations than has been deemed necessary in any previous period of our history. On the contrary, seeing that our own experience and that of all foreign nations has shown that success at sea has no necessary relation to the size and number of ships, it appears to me to be a mischievous delusion. When we cease to be more than a match, man for man and ton for ton, for any nation we may have to fight at sea, I believe that the days of our naval supremacy are practically ended, and that no mere multiplication of men and tonnage will prolong its existence for any time worth talking about. In this I may be, for the moment, a voice crying in the wilderness. But for the moment the voice ought not to fall wholly on deaf ears, because so many people in this country and abroad are looking anxiously towards the proceedings of the forthcoming conference at The Hague, and the part which Great Britain is to play there. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has just told the world that our superiority in naval armaments implies no challenge to any other power, and has confidently appealed to the world to recognise that it has no aim or tendency but the maintenance of peace. When Napoleon was at St. Helena, he explained to the faithful who shared his exile that he had been misunderstood, and that he had merely endeavoured to establish a sort of French hegemony in the world in order to render wars impossible in the future. It is possible that he may have had such an aspiration loosely floating in his mind, and the result would unquestionably have been secured had France been able to become the world's ruler, supported by a physical force which would have rendered all resistance to her behests impossible. But what nation would have trusted France with such a supremacy, and counted on her invariably using it in the general interest?

I entirely sympathise with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's desire to effect a general reduction of armaments. It is sad to think of the amount that is annually wasted in such unremunerative expenditure. Moreover, these huge armies and navies are themselves a cause of war. They encourage a state of mind which is antagonistic to peace. I see no objection to general disarmament being discussed at the Hague Conference, for such discussion will call attention to its desirability. But until some one has brought forward some concrete plan for a general scheme of disarmament, I believe that the suggestion will remain a counsel of perfection. Disarmament will only be the result of each nation coming to the conclusion that it cannot afford to spend the present sums in warding off possible dangers. Wars, and the maintenance of vast armaments, are so ruinous, and so injurious to the well-being of a community, that in the end the workers and toilers will insist upon reductions in war budgets. But this will never be the outcome of an arrangement between nations limiting the amount of the expenditure of each, for each will put forward some special plea for its forces being proportionately greater than those of its neighbours.

Sir Henry himself is really doing this in our case. He demands that the principle should be generally recognised that our Navy is to give us a practical superiority on the high seas, and he pleads that we desire no conquests, and that we should only use this superiority in the interests of all. In the past, it is certain that we have not done this. Some hundred or more years ago we put forward such pretensions, based upon our naval supremacy, that two successive leagues of neutrals to defend their rights against us were formed. When, after the peace of Amiens, war again broke out between us and France, we declared, in defiance of what was then recognised as international law, that all enemies' vessels on the high seas were good prizes, although they had received no notification of the state of war; and this was followed by the United States going to war with us because we insisted on exercising the right to search all neutral vessels and to seize all on board of them that we asserted were British subjects, and incorporate them in our Navy. But even assuming that we have recognised the illegality of such courses, and that they are not likely to be renewed, let us fairly consider what is the meaning of a supremacy on the high seas. It means that we have the power to destroy the trade and commerce of any other country with which we may go to war. There was a time when pretty well all trade and commerce were in our hands. At present many other nations compete with us. They have learnt that their prosperity is dependent upon production of goods, and upon finding a market in which to sell them. In this way alone can they become wealthy. Is it likely, then, that they will agree, as part of a plan of general disarmament, that their prosperity shall be dependent on our goodwill, because, unlike other nations, we are never likely to abuse this maritime supremacy? Moreover, ships of war are now huge floating fortresses. These fortresses can be moved by steam to any part of the world, and their presence on the shores of an enemy would almost enable their possessor to dictate his own terms. We are already in possession of the high road to the East. We could close the Suez Canal, and it is certain that no European maritime nation would be able to send a fleet or to transport an army to the East viâ the Cape route. For us, therefore, to base our proposal for disarmament upon an admission by foreign powers that we are to stereotype this state of things, and that we and they are to agree that we will each only build vessels to maintain the present naval relations between them and us, seems to me hardly a practical proposal to which they would assent.

Sir Henry points to our just now spending a little less on our Navy than we did a year ago. True. But what if we look back ten or twenty years?

In 1887 the Naval Estimates were a trifle over twelve millions. In 1897 they were twenty-two millions. In 1907 they are thirty-one millions. Moreover, our Government insists, as did its predecessor before it, that though the cost has recently been reduced, our naval strength—the only matter that a foreign Power is concerned about—is as great to-day as three years ago, when the year's bill came to thirty-six millions. This increase of naval armaments, it must be remembered, has been accompanied by increases in the Army, on nearly as big a scale in point of expenditure, though the visible results in numbers and efficiency are less evident. In 1887 the Army Estimates were eighteen millions, and half a million of the money voted was not expended. For the following ten years the sum remained about the same. Then came the South African War, which left our peace expenditure for two or three years at thirty millions or over. It has now got back to twenty-seven millions, but is still half as much again as in 1897; and these figures do not include the cost of the Indian Army. Taking Navy and Home Army together the figures for the twenty years stand thus: 1887, thirty-one millions; 1897, forty millions; 1907, fifty-nine millions. No other Power has made anything like these increases in its naval and military budgets during the same period. For us, who have set the example of such huge inflation of expenditure and effective strength, to ask other nations to reduce their armaments, while consenting to ours being maintained on the present scale, seems to be making a suggestion that we know would be declined. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's proposal reminds me of La Fontaine's fable of the wolf who proposed to a flock of sheep to assume the garb of a shepherd, and to defend it against the evil designs of all beasts of prey. I do not believe that foreign Powers will ever agree to a reduction of armaments based upon some mysterious rule of three. But of this I am certain: they will never consent to a permanent engagement in regard to the size of navies which will assure the absolute supremacy on the high seas of any one of them. If it be correct that such a supremacy is necessary for our security, and if we are ready to pay for it, I think it very probable that our supremacy will not be contested, because we are a very rich nation. But between the grudging acquiescence of foreign nations in acceptance of our supremacy by force of necessity and the formal recognition of it by an international agreement there is a very wide difference.

A PHYSICIAN MALGRÉ LUI.

A most extraordinary line of action has been taken by the General Medical Council in the case of Dr. John Shaw, which was dealt with in Truth of February 13 and 20. It will be remembered that Dr. Shaw is at issue with the prevalent opinion of the profession as to the result of operating in cases of fibroid tumour; that, having found himself boycotted in the attempt to promulgate his views through the ordinary professional channels, he embodied them in a book avowedly addressed to the lay public; that he was called upon by the Royal College of Physicians, of which he was a member, to explain his conduct in publishing this book, the College being of opinion that an appeal to lay opinion was irregular conduct on the part of one of its members; and that thereupon Dr. Shaw returned his diploma to the Royal College of Physicians, and requested the Registrar of the General Medical Council to remove his name from the Medical Register, where it had been for thirty years, his object being to wage war in the cause which he had taken up with a free hand, and untrammelled by any consideration of professional propriety. All this I have already dealt with. We come now to the next stage in the case.

Dr. Shaw's request for the removal of his name from the register was made on January 19. The official reply on January 21 was that in accordance with the standing orders of the General Medical Council, the licensing bodies whose qualifications Dr. Shaw held would be asked if they had any objection to his name being removed, and the matter would "then be brought before the proper authorities of this Council." It thus appears that it does not rest with a registered practitioner to remove his name spontaneously from the Medical Register. The bodies whose qualifications he holds must first be consulted, and have a locus standi to object to the withdrawal of his name. The next communication which Dr. Shaw received carried the matter a good deal further. Here it is:—

General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom,
299, Oxford-street, London, W.,
[No. 16,980.] 27th February, 1907.

John Shaw, Esq., M.D.,
32, New Cavendish-street, W.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 19th January was considered by the Executive Committee of the Council on 25th inst., and I was directed to inform you that, as information has been received that your resignation of the membership of the Royal College of Physicians of London has been accepted by that College, I have been directed to erase that qualification from the register; but that, in view of the statement in your letter, the Committee was not prepared to accede to your request for the erasure of your name from the Medical Register, but have referred the application to the General Council, by which it will be considered at the session to be held in May next.—Yours faithfully, (Signed) A. E. Allen, Registrar.

Dr. Shaw at once inquired what statement in his letter was here referred to, and on what grounds such statement was regarded as a reason for refusing to comply with his request. In his first letter to the Registrar, he had asked for information as to the legal effect of the removal of his name, giving as his reason, "as I must, of course, continue to earn my livelihood from the practice of my profession as an unregistered practitioner." He was now informed by the Registrar that these words were the statement referred to in the above letter of February 19 as the reason why the Executive Committee could not accede to his request for the removal of his name. To this explanation were added the somewhat significant words, "I am not authorised to state further the grounds on which the Executive referred the matter to the General Council." Dr. Shaw replied to this letter at considerable length, stating fully his position and his reasons for the course he had taken; but concluding by a formal withdrawal of his request for the removal of his name from the register, "in order that the General Medical Council shall not shirk the issues by eventually accepting my resignation."

The situation thus created is decidedly curious, and the next development may be awaited with interest both by the medical profession and the public. Dr.

Shaw's last letter was only written on March 6, and the Executive Committee of the G.M.C. must necessarily think it over before an answer can be given. If they accept the withdrawal of Dr. Shaw's request, there must be a temporary pause in the hostilities, and it will remain to be seen whether any professional body will take action for the compulsory removal of Dr. Shaw's name from the register. Although he has resigned his membership of the Royal College of Physicians, and this qualification has been struck off the registration of his name, as above mentioned, he retains, of course, his degree of M.D. of London. It is not likely that the University of London will enter the field as a combatant; but it may be that the Royal College of Physicians may move further, having failed to extract from Dr. Shaw an explanation of his unprofessional conduct; or it may be that the General Medical Council, having the whole of the facts before it, may accept the challenge which Dr. Shaw has delivered and proceed of its own motion to strike his name off the register, notwithstanding his withdrawal of his request for its removal. Up to the present, however, the disposition to fight the question seems rather more pronounced on Dr. Shaw's side than on the other. In the meantime, we have the extraordinary spectacle of a medical man striving to remove his name from the register, and baulked by the General Medical Council itself, through its Executive Committee. But for his first withdrawal of his request, Dr. Shaw would be now almost literally a médecin malgré lui—a registered practitioner in spite of himself. The original refusal to comply with his request until the Royal College of Physicians had been consulted is perhaps not inexplicable or indefensible. The Council could not allow a man to retire voluntarily from the official ranks of the profession while there was a possibility that questions were pending which might involve his retirement compulsorily. But after the College of Physicians was known to have accepted the resignation of the Doctor's diploma, it is difficult to see what right the Council, or its executive representatives, have to make any difficulty about his retirement. The reason for this action the Executive Committee have themselves stated. Dr. Shaw has admitted that he proposes to continue the practice of his profession as an unregistered man. But this he has a perfect legal right to do. That the General Medical Council should have power to prevent him from practising as an unregistered man and compel him to remain on the register whether he desires it or not, seems an outrageous proposition. Why should the Executive Committee put it forward? Apparently because it is desired, if possible, to expose Dr. Shaw to the slur of having been struck off the register compulsorily—a slur which will, of course, prejudice him in any attempts he may make to continue in practice. There is no other visible motive for throwing obstacles in the way of his voluntary retirement and referring the matter to the consideration of the Council itself at a date about three months distant. Dr. Shaw has now given the professional authorities an opportunity of expelling him from the ranks of registered practitioners if they desire it. But this does not in the least alter the fact that they have already manifested a desire to kick him out if they can, in preference to allowing him to depart in peace. It is the manifestation of this desire which deserves notice, and which is so thoroughly in keeping with all that has previously transpired in regard to the attitude of the professional authorities in this case.

THE THEATRES.

"The Great Conspiracy," at the Duke of York's.

The power of the Napoleonic legend to attract and fascinate is shown by the immense literature in fiction—history, and half-and-half—which has grown up around the greatest conqueror of modern times. In the drama also this influence has been often revealed, and most short men, squat or slim, feel on their best days that they have about them something of Napoleon. Only once have I seen on the stage what struck me as a colourable reflection of an incident in Napoleon's career. That was the French version of "Madame Sans-Gêne," grotesque and even caricature in parts, yet more near to reality than many a pompous display, adorned with the bees and the N.s.

In "The Great Conspiracy" we have an adaptation by Madeline Lucette Ryley of Pierre Berton's drama. It is in the grand panjandrum style; that is, much parade, many marshals, and ladies of the Napoleon Court in gorgeous dresses. The story is one which is quite new to me, and I should imagine to most readers of history. Psychologically, no doubt, many aristocrats, like the Marquis de Tallemont, would have enjoyed giving Napoleon his death in any way they could, and the explosion at the end of the first act was a very probable expression of opinion, though I am not aware to what period of his career it refers. This does not materially affect the play, and, indeed, does not at all matter, as Miss Ryley has made of the Bonaparte of M. Berton, Napoleon, with the object of affording to elderly Mr. John Hare a suitable part. The attempt to blow up the Emperor does not succeed in the play, and, indeed, it may be doubted whether at any time a dramatist or his adapter will be found sufficiently bold to abolish St. Helena. But in "The Great Conspiracy" plotting continues throughout, and Miss Irene Vanbrugh, "La Belle Marseillaise," after having been married much against her will to Crisenoy, has an opportunity for a fine bit of acting when she prevents the Emperor from taking snuff from the fatal box. Her objection to sudden marriage with Crisenoy is reasonable enough, seeing that her husband still lives, but this objection is waived for reasons political. The police plays, of course, a great part in this drama, and we are alternately bidden to laugh at the stupidity of Regnier, Minister of Justice, and to admire the astuteness of Fouché (presumably not yet Duc d'Otrante), well played by Mr. Robertshaw.

Napoleon, in the hands of Mr. Hare, was a very stern, diplomatic personage; much as one would suppose Metternich to have played the part at private theatricals after the Congress of Vienna. Private theatricals were not the vogue at the beginning of last century, and Metternich would not have played in them, if they had been. But Napoleon, who died young considering his career—just over fifty—was by all accounts a much more volcanic personage than Mr. Hare makes of him. Mr. Hare gives him plenty of dignity, but not enough of the devil.

The play does not need serious analysis, so far as the plot is concerned, and one must fall back upon the playing rather than the play, if one is to be interested in "The Great Conspiracy." Napoleon would not have taken more than a second to discover by the voice and manner of "La Belle Marseillaise" in the last act, that something was wrong about his snuff-box. But he quite fails in this, thereby giving to Mr. John Hare and Miss Irene Vanbrugh their chief opportunity for a pretty piece of playing.

Garrick Theatre.

The Sheridan of the Garrick Theatre is not the youthful dramatist with whom most people are acquainted, but, as has been abundantly pointed out, Miss Unger's Sheridan has struck forty. This does not, however, in the least affect his mercurial temperament, and his wit is as ready as ever. In fact, he is constantly saying things which have reference to earlier periods of his life, and a constant reminder of happy marriage faces him in the portrait of his first wife. This portrait of Miss Linley is the cynosure of Esther Ogle's eyes, and it does not take long to ascertain the lines on which the comedy is going to run. Tom Sheridan the son is to be eclipsed by his brilliant father, and the heart of the beautiful Miss Ogle is to be won by the celebrated dramatist and widower, with one or two slight bars leaped on the way. The dialogue, apart from the numerous quotations of old jokes, which are deftly introduced, is without distinction, yet serves well enough the purposes of the play. Peers did not talk like Lord Cray in Sheridan's day, any more than in ours; they did not make crude plots to betray their friends and benefactors in the way that Lord Cray does; but they have done so for a long time on the stage, and so, doubtless, all is well. Actresses of the period must have been very alarming if they behaved and talked as loudly as did Kitty Montmorency, and they must have also been less ambitious than in our day, if they philosophically descended to the level of the hostess of an inn. Yet Miss Nancy Price was doubtless bidden to accentuate as she does, that the contrast with the refinement of Miss A. Carlisle's Esther Ogle may be more apparent. Apart from Mr. Bourchier, who is well suited in the part of Sheridan, save that he does not convey the feeling of being very sincere in his wooing, there are some fine actors, such as Mr. Sydney Valentine, who has to be very angry with Sheridan in mistake for his son, and there is Mr. C. V. France, who has less chance than Mr. Valentine of showing his powers, which are known to be very considerable. Mr. Keightley and Mr. Bristowe, as respectively the scheming peer and the messenger from the bank who runs stammering after Sheridan with an order for £15,000, which he fails to deliver till the last act, were neither of them effective. But the latter, at any rate, is so silly a conception that I cannot imagine any one making it entertaining. Yet there can be no doubt that this comedy is of a sort that entertains many simple folk. It has no value as dramatic literature, save that it gives opportunities to Mr. Bourchier and others for the display of their undoubted talents. The ideal is to get the two—play and playing; here we have the latter, and must, I suppose, be thankful with due moderation.

"John Glayde's Honour," at the St. James's Theatre.

This new play by Mr. Sutro combines the two qualities of which I found one lacking in the above-mentioned productions. "John Glayde's Honour" gives the actor his full opportunity, and does not, as in those other plays, sacrifice for this purpose anything of probability. The dialogue here differs as chalk from cheese from that sort of dialogue which resembles nothing so much as those labels marked with a sentiment that issue from the mouths of politicians in the cartoons of the eighteenth century. Mr. Sutro has evidently studied most carefully his environment. Almost in the setting of the first act, with its elegant arrangements for luxurious living and the bird's-eye view of Paris from that upper story of the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne, one feels the sort of persons with whom we are to have the brief traffic of the stage. They soon, however, clear up any floating doubts that may remain. Muriel Glayde, the wife of the millionaire who has for so long left her to her own devices, stands forth brilliantly characterised by the art of Mr. Sutro combined with that of Miss Eva Moore. Not wholly superficial, she is capable of a "grande passion," and in the person of the young artist she has evidently found it. Over against her nervous existence stands that of her husband, John Glayde, the neglectful millionaire, who, at the end of the act, attempts to win back his wife's affection, which he has so wilfully alienated through neglect. The play proceeds in a perfectly orderly manner toward its conclusion, for in the second act we find Mr. Glayde at deadly grips both with his young rival in his wife's affections and with a great financial combination against him. Here, it is that Mr. Sutro has shown us real mastery of his material, made of John Glayde so living a personage that I have never seen Mr. Alexander to better advantage, and in the personage of the hard, business-like clerk, admirably incarnated by Mr. Michael Sherbrooke, a being almost crude for realism. The cross-purposes and cross-dialogue of this act are very interesting to hear, and the devices by which Mr. Sutro introduces the young artist and the wife, and contrives that these two shall have a passionate love-scene while Mr. Glayde is out of the room sending off cables, show consummate knowledge applied. Business and love intermixed inextricably: that is the material of the second act; and in the third there is no sense of flagging, seeing that it concludes with that scene of exquisite perfidy, so true of such a woman, in which Mrs. Glayde cajoles her husband into the belief that she has definitely abandoned her intrigue, at the very moment when she is about to fly with her lover. In the last act Mr. Sutro reveals to us an unexpected side of the character of John Glayde. Having surprised his wife on the point of departure with her lover, he does all mortal man can do to persuade her to give him up. She refuses absolutely to alter her course of conduct. The young artist appears, and she and the audience alike, apprehend violence on the part of John Glayde. Not at all; he has recognised the inevitable, and now acquiesces in it. In a few brief words, John Glayde tells his wife that she is free, for he will divorce her, and yet more, that he will make her an adequate allowance. Such magnanimity certainly surprises, but I feel that Mr. Sutro probably knows a great deal more about the inner workings of his hero's mind, with whom he has lived so long, than can one who sees him for the first time.

There can be no doubt that "John Glayde's Honour" adds largely to Mr. Sutro's reputation as a dramatist. His play will be witnessed by many thousands of people, and whatever may be said of its other qualities, none can deny to it those great ones of observation, perspicuity, and concision. The playing was throughout very good. Among others, Messrs. M. Lang, Graham Browne, and Norman Forbes all distinguished themselves, and Miss Henrietta Watson gave to the unsympathetic part of the Princesse its share of interest.

At the Bechstein Hall, Miss Muriel Matter's recitation of various poems by D. G. Rossetti, Robert Browning, and others of our well-known names, was marked by a singular perfection both in perception and expression. The refined art of Rossetti stood out in marked contrast to the somewhat crude appeal to the emotions of Lindsay Gordon's "Stock-Rider."

Mrs. Patrick Campbell is an old friend of Ibsen, and much more in her element as an extractor of the quintessence of Hedda Gabler than as milkmaid to Mr. Hall Caine. The performance of Ibsen's play at the Court Theatre ranks high among the many interesting revivals I have witnessed at the Court under the present management. Apart from Mrs. Campbell, whose work on this occasion was on a par with the performance of Miss Elizabeth Robins, which is a memory of the past, I admired especially the Tesman of Mr. Trevor Lowe. But it seems invidious to single out names in a cast which had the greatest of qualities —unity—though I cannot forbear from including Miss Marian Lea's name. As Thea, the excitable, the loving, this actress gave a very fine performance, and the object of her affections found in Mr. Lawrence Irving always an adequate explanation.

* * * * *

At the Aldwych Theatre "Nelly Neil" has reached and passed its fiftieth performance. Great changes have been made in the play, though the first act is still too full and taken too slowly. Mr. Fred Wright, jun. (Donetti), has come as an able auxiliary to Mr. Coyne, whom I noticed particularly on the occasion of the first performance. The chief alterations are in the last act with its lively scene between the police and the Suffragettes, and if the whole entertainment could be taken as rapidly as the arrests of the militant ladies, I believe "Nelly Neil" would go with a snap. Miss Edna May plays and sings as winsomely as ever, and Miss Kitty Gordon scores a genuine success with her song of the cigarette.

NOTES FROM PARIS

LADY MUSICAL CONDUCTORS.

THE example of Prince Robert de Broglie has, it seems, emboldened the Princesse Armande de Polignac to conduct the orchestra at the Nice Opera House. There is but one lady named Armande in the Polignac family; she is the eldest daughter of Prince Camille de Polignac and Marie Langenberger, his first wife, who was said to be a professional musician. She has been the wife for the last eleven or twelve years of Comte Chabannes-la-Palice, and would now be about thirty. Her father's second wife was a Miss Margaret Knight, of Wolverley. Her family lived for some years at the long, roomy, and not very picturesque château overlooking the pond-like spring-head from which Le Loiret issues a navigable river. Bolingbroke resided there through the time of his exile, and had Voltaire and other bright wits down from Paris to cheat the tedium of the long summer days. Neither of Miss Knight's two daughters, Mabel or Agnès de Polignac, can be the orchestra leader.

All the society heavy swells of Nice went to encourage Mme. Armande de Polignac on the evening of her début as a conductor. The opera was "Cavalleria Rusticana." A diamond merchant, who also went, tells me that he never saw a more brilliant display of the gems in which he deals. He describes the appearance of the débutante as "very English," and speaks of her as "having a slight English accent, but with a musical voice and more breadth of diction than one is used to in London drawing-rooms." This would apply to Armande, née Princesse de Polignac, who passed twelve years under the care of Miss Knight. The eldest half-sister, Princesse Mabel, is barely twenty. The description is, however, applicable to her of a "young shy miss, at once determined and blushing, slender as a willow but stiff and bolt upright, seemingly gifted with a head, and correct in all respects as the young nobleman who moves the Address in the House of Lords."

The Chabannes de la Palice are scarcely in the spirit of a time that gives us women cabbies, lady advocates, doctresses, and a feminist Government. They belong to the Court of Marie Amélie and still hang round the d'Orléans. The Polignacs have very much gone with the tide in the marriages of the junior scions. The late Prince Alphonse did not hesitate to become the son-in-law of Mirès of shady memory, and the patron, by the way, of the late Daniel Iffla, otherwise Osris. Prince Edmond, his brother, is husband of Winaretta Singer, whose opulence is due to the paternal sewing machine.

Mme. Armande de Polignac, as she is styled on the bill of the Nice Opera House, met with an enthusiastic reception before she took her place in front of the footlights. The audience were mostly British and American. "How do you know they were?" In this way. The greater part of the gentlemen clapped their hands in cadence. One might feel sure that all who tapped the floor with their canes or the heels of their boots were French.

Mme. Armande wore a black dress of an elegantly easy fit, and loose from the waist up. It afforded the freest play to the arms, but gave her a rather maypole figure, which, however, had character, and suited the part she played. She had no jewels save a neat brooch of no great value. Her small, narrow hands helped the effects of the conductor's wand.

Victor Hugo's beloved friend, Mlle. Louise Bertin (daughter of Bertin of the "Débats"), conducted the orchestra at the Paris Opera House, when her "Esmeralda" was on there. She laboured under the terrible disadvantage of being deformed. Victor Hugo had helped her with the libretto, which she took from his "Notre Dame de Paris." His enemies spoke of her as belonging to the collection of monsters in that astounding novel. A Royalist reviewer saw in her a sister of the hunchback Quasimodo. A Mme. Thys conducted concert orchestras with distinction. She had the advantage of a fine, freely grown and developed figure, all ease and harmony, and of a magnetic personality.

I received nothing less than a shock on learning of the death of my dear and highly-valued friend, the Hon. Dr. Alan Herbert, with whom I had been acquainted for very many years. He was quite unlike his brothers, the late Earl of Carnarvon and the Hon. Auberon Herbert, but as perfect in his gentlemanly qualities and delicate moral sense as either. His resemblance to his mother, a Countess of Carnarvon, could not be more striking than that of his younger brother to their aunt, the late Countess of Suffolk, the adored mother-in-law of the present Countess-Dowager of Suffolk. This aunt had a high-strung nature that ran into idealism—pure, tender, and one may almost say heavenly—loved flowers, birds, children, and had a heart that bled for the houseless and the homeless. I do not think she left a descendant who resembled her in a remarkable degree. But I thought her rather the spiritual mother and the feminine prototype than the aunt of Mr. Auberon Herbert. She created the garden side of the grounds in which the Jacobean house of Charlton Park stands. The park is majestic, rich, soft, "the Countess's garden" a sweet paradise. Her sensibility might have made her life too painful had she not found an anæsthetic in her gardening operations. The Countess of Carnarvon had also keen and lively sensibilities, but balanced by a fine judgment and practical good sense. She lost her husband when her children were young, and devoted herself to their education, bringing them up according to the ideas of Maria Edgeworth. They were taught never to look to patronage, but to their own efforts. She often expressed before them contempt for human barnacles and sprigs of nobility who sought to live in sloth and comfort at the expense of the hard-working. They might not have the reward of wealth, but they would have the true respect of others and the approval of their own consciences. Her children drank in her teachings, but assimilated them differently. All had tender hearts, a passion for justice, love of truth. But the Doctor best agreed with the conditions and the spirit of his time. His feelings were wrapped up. He could enjoy the refined epicureanism of Paris, which is really a fine flower of humanism, and he enjoyed in his somewhat shy way the pleasures of friendship. I never knew any one who had a more lucid perception of scientific truth, or could better unravel complex and perplexing questions. The last time I had a long talk with him was as he took me home from a dinner at the house of an American lady in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne. He spoke with enthusiasm of the delicious Paris of former days—an active, lively Paris, but never in a hurry, and not merely the fountain-head of fashion, elegance, art, but science and high literature. He remained faithful to the boulevards and the Champs Elysées. They had completely changed, except in the ground plan as traced on the map of Paris. He pointed out the site of the house (now replaced by a Pelmonte palace) where as a student he made chums with another future doctor, an American named Curtis, both living the life of incomparable Paris, such as it then was.

This Englishman abroad, in becoming so Parisian, lost no English quality or peculiarity. He never married, seemed very well-off, lived with quiet dignity and charming amiability, and took an almost paternal interest in the Hertford Hospital. It was he and a Dr. Shepmel who inspired Sir Richard Wallace with the idea and desire to found and endow it. Dr. Herbert drew up the scheme and the plan for the architect. It is for British subjects of the old country and colonies, without distinction. In the experimental stage Dr. Herbert had only to say: "Sir Richard, we want such and such a sum." A cheque for the amount came by return of post. Lady Wallace fulfilled in a cheerful spirit the clause in her husband's will enjoining his executors to keep up the Hertford Hospital on the scale on which it had been kept up in his own lifetime. Since her death the disposition has been less cheerful.

Dr. Herbert had the virtue of hospitality. He often gave dinners, and, I should say, at a rather heavy expense, the plate, set out, and service being in the best French style, with, however, a snugness that bespoke his English ancestry. As a host he had a cheerful manner, and chatted pleasantly, with just a point of sly humour. Believing that human beings must learn from their own experience, he rather wished to improve than reform the world, but thought we owed something to the quixotic people, though in our delicately adjusted and very complex human societies they often are a cause of wreckage and ravage. They sometimes reminded him of children who tear open the rosebud to make the rose it holds bloom. Among the English friends and relatives of Dr. Herbert whom I met at his table were Eveline, Countess of Portsmouth, a very remarkable woman, though not setting up to be so; Lady Gwendolen Herbert; different Cowpers who had been brought up under the eye of Lord and Lady Palmerston; Lord Carnarvon; Sir Francis Plunket; Lord and Lady Burghclere—the niece of whom he felt so proud as a mignonne piece of perfection and an authoress who never suffered her fingers to be stained with ink; Sir Bruce and Lady Seton; the late Lord Goschen and his son, with illustrissimi of the Royal Society and Institute. He did not generally mix French with English company, but, as he looked on me as being Parisianised in feeling, made an exception.

After one of my visits to Ashley Arnewood, the New Forest home of Mr. Auberon and Lady Florence Herbert, the Doctor called to ask whether I had found them all well. I must have greatly pleased him in telling him how like the youngest boy, now Lord Lucas, was to him. He rubbed his hands with pleasure, and, indeed, looked quite joyful. He then said: "I must go soon to visit them all and to judge for myself as to the likeness you speak of." He then spoke of Christmas family parties, which he used to attend as a small boy at Charlton Park. Dr. Alan patted his Carnarvon nephew on the back for going in, as an art collector, for the pictorial advertisements on the walls of Paris, especially those of Cheret, for having a sceptical mind with dealers, and for entirely following his own taste.

Maeterlinck will soon be one of the dramatic authors who have their homes in the country and the mere pied à terre in Paris, a growing practice due to the motor. He is now the owner of the ruined abbey of Sainte Wandrille-en-Caux, and of the Seine-side farm on which it now stands. While the work goes on of restoring the ruins, the glorifier of the bees will stay at the farmhouse. There he can pursue his studies in natural history and in Norman characteristics. He can also oversee the restoration of the Abbey. His ideas of snugness are Belgian. Maeterlinck thinks them compatible with the dignity of Gothic architecture as it evolved towards the close of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth. There is an air of comfort in the Louis XII. part of the Château de Blois and in the Hotel de Cluny, the dower residence of the last wife of Louis XII., an English Princess.

It is agreed to hold the coming wedding of M. Francis de Croisset and Mlle. Dietz-Monnin as a Parisian event. The fable that the bridegroom had asked to pass into the church on that occasion through the waters of baptism had not even the colour of probability. The announcement that Mme. Jeanne Granier has offered to be M. Croisset's godmother kept at least probability in view. He owes to her much of his early success, and he has helped to prolong her perennial youth. The truth is that if M. de Croisset's father is a Belgian Jew, his mother is a British Catholic. She had him christened before he was a week old, and in due time confirmed and admitted to the First Communion. M. de Croisset is handsome, dresses with smart elegance, and, under the air of a man of fashion, is very serious. His fiancée belongs to a Protestant family, and is the daughter, also, of a Catholic mother—a rare thing in a French Protestant community. The semi-Judaism of her future husband pleases the Dietz-Monnin connection. There is hardly any difference between Liberal Protestants and Liberal Jews.

The diamond merchant whom I have just quoted gives this bit of interesting information. "Diamonds were never so plentiful as now, and yet never so dear." "How do you account for that?" "By the great diffusion of wealth and the growing power of women. A Porgès or a Cecil Rhodes cannot deck himself out like a Shah of Persia. His diamonds must be used to adorn the necks of the other sex. Brazilians, not to be laughed at by Parisian satirists, have given up sticking brilliants in their shirt-fronts and cravats. No lady whose husband is at all rich will now wear paste. Just before the Carnival I went to a Trades' Company ball. This company is not famous for its wealth. Well, none of the ladies, so far as I could see, wore paste, and there were brilliants on most of the necks and in the coiffures. Twenty years ago those who wore brilliants at such a ball would have been the exceptions." "How do you know that what you took for brilliants the other night were not imitations?" "By the intensity of the real diamond. You know those blue blazes that almost blind you. They defy imitation. If we must satisfy the craving of women for diamonds we shall have to outrun the late M. Moissan. He made diamond dust artificially. We must transmute lumps of sugar into good-sized brilliants." "Do you think that possible?" "Certainly. Moissan thought it very possible, and he said so six weeks before he died. His death must have relieved some members of the De Beers Company from a heavy anxiety."

My informant further said: "The firm I belong to cleared between 1898 and 1902 at the rate of 400,000 fr. a month, with diamonds. It now has a business worth 600,000 fr. a month, and on the upward grade. Commercial men who may not care for their wives deck them out with diamonds as an advertisement of solvency, which it is. Enormously rich men from vanity lavish brilliants on theatrical and operatic stars. The fire of Mlle. Croizette's diamonds in 'La Princesse de Bagdad' proclaimed the wealth of M. Stern and a certain Royal Duc. Léonide Leblanc, as Duchesse de Guise, in the drama of the same name, was perhaps more dazzling. Wanda de Boncksa, in a few years, gathered together more than a million francs' worth of pearls and diamonds. The cantatrice whom a gold or coal king (it does not matter which) foisted on the ex-director of the Opera House could now live in opulence on the produce of her casket were she to realise it. He found sometimes satisfaction for his vanity in sending thirty or forty thousand francs' worth of flowers to adorn her dressing-room or be cast at her feet whenever she appeared for the first time in a part or came back after a short absence. It delighted him to hear her sing out of tune. This proved his toute puissance. She was called by the habitués and her comrades 'la Dame aux quarante mille francs de fleurs.' One winter's evening he sent her in at the close of a roulade a gorgeous basket filled with the choicest tea-roses and festooned with a chain studded with brilliants. His fortune is on a sure basis, and he can fear no crack. It would be the ruin of a commercial man, however wealthy, to distinguish himself in the same way, because extravagance of this kind could not fail to shake his credit. On the other hand, the more he spends on his wife or on the corbeille de mariage of a daughter, the better for his business reputation."

The "Dame aux quarante mille francs de fleurs" brought on the late directorial crisis at the Opera House. M. Briand belongs to a working-class family. His name of Aristide like noblesse, oblige. He has risen from a humble condition through the severe practice of his virtues. The display of flowers and brilliants seemed to the subscribers in bad taste, but to M. Briand something abominable. He felt as did Mr. John Burns some years ago at the sight of amiably fast company which had found its way at tea-time on a certain terrace which has a world-wide celebrity. "Is the Opera House a seraglio?" he asked himself. "If it is, it must cease to be so, and engagements must go according to capacity and talent." M. Briand is obstinate. The power of wealth arrayed itself against him. It directed against him the power of the press and of cabal in the Chamber of Deputies. Nothing could drive him from his determination not to let the Opera House serve as a byre for the golden calf, and he has ended by having his own way—at any rate, for the time being.

It is dangerous to boast. The Citizen Viviani declared in Parliament his determination to put out the lights of heaven. The class he represents, taking every one else by surprise, reduced la Ville Lumière to darkness. A universal extinguisher was applied in cutting off the entire electrical supply. Theatres, restaurants, the Elysée palace, thoroughfares, and the Metro. found themselves plunged in black darkness.

I think the 2,000 electricians who got up the strike were right. They did so to prevent a repetition of the job of 1872 or 1873, which, for the benefit of M. Dubochet, President of the Gas Company, signed a lease giving him the lion's share. This lease kept gas twice as dear as in most other capitals. A second lease granted eighteen years ago gave similar advantages to a syndicate of electrical companies. This job dated from the time when so many Boulangists sat in the Town Council and Panamism reigned everywhere. There was, however, the excuse of electric lighting on a great scale being experimental. These syndicates now want a twenty-five years' monopoly. Of course, this advantage is to be to the detriment of every one else. They want to screw down the public, and reduce by a half the retiring fund of their operators. It is to defend the opponents in the Town Council of the proposed trust that the 2,000 electricians struck. I only hope they may succeed in putting down the jobbery which has inflicted on us for so long a time bad and dear gas and far too dear electric light.

A PEER AMONG THE PUSHERS.

I HAVE been feeling a good deal cut up since last week. For one thing, it has all got out about my writing, and I have had to put up with no end of chaff about it. It was my young brother, Bob, that told me about it first, and, naturally, he rubbed it in. He came up to me in the club, on Thursday, and wanted to know what it felt like to be the champion ass of the century. Of course, I told him he ought to know better than I could—it was about the only thing I could think of on the spur of the moment—and then he told me that every one knew all about it, and was laughing at me no end. I told him I didn't see anything funny in it, and that lots of other fellows write for the papers, and that I didn't suppose what I wrote was anything very different. But he said it was, and that you only let me go on with it because it amused your readers—who are all, he said, the worst kind of Radicals and Socialists and things—to see what an ass I was making of myself and the House of Lords and all the rest of it. He can be rather biting when he likes, and if I hadn't remembered to ask him for a tenner he borrowed from me last week he would have probably made me lose my temper—silly young ass. I couldn't think how it had come out, for, of course, I have never mentioned it to a soul, and I was rather inclined to suspect that you must have been making use of it—thinking it might get you a better class of readers, perhaps, or some idea of that sort. But, according to Bob, I had let it out myself without knowing it. He said that for the last three weeks I had been always going about everywhere with a copy of Truth under my arm and opening it out and reading it whenever I thought nobody was looking at me, and sniggering over it. He said, too, that no one could have possibly doubted it for a moment, because I was always talking about these articles—mine, I mean—and saying how clever they were, and how I wished I could have written them, and pretending to be awfully puzzled over who it could be. As a matter of fact, I had done so sometimes—because I thought it might disarm suspicion—and I suppose I must have overdone it a bit.

Bob wasn't the worst of it by a long way. I hadn't left the club ten minutes when, at the corner of Pall Mall, I ran up against my old Uncle Herbert. We haven't spoken to each other since the news of my engagement to Jessie was announced. He behaved like a cad about it, and said things that I couldn't allow any one to say in my presence, and I lost my temper a bit, and since then we have cut each other. But this time he came straight at me and asked me if I didn't think I had disgraced the family enough already without starting this new tom-foolery. He put it in pretty strong language—he used to be in the Army, and made no end of a fool of himself in South Africa—and if he had been forty years younger I should have had to kick him or something. As it was, I just told him that I had as much right to make a living as any one else, and that when I wanted his permission I would ask for it. And as to journalism, I wasn't the first of our class to do it, and that Roberts and Wolseley had both written things, and he had better go and talk to them about it. He said it wasn't writing that he objected to, but writing blithering tom-foolery and making myself and my family a laughing stock, and that if I must write on a paper there were plenty of decent ones I could have chosen instead of such—and then he said one or two things about Truth I should rather like you to have heard. The last thing he said was that if I had only let him know beforehand he would have got me half-a-dozen directorships or a place in the War Office, or something where my asininity would not matter.

I was feeling pretty bad by the time I got to Jessie's flat, and I found that she was as upset as I was about things. It seemed that her beast of a manager had been at her that very afternoon, offering her a £20 a week rise in her salary if she would only get me to bring her name and the name of the piece she is playing in and the theatre into one of my articles, and say how pretty she was, and that it was a first-class show and that sort of thing, and sign it. She was furious, and she'd thrown up her part on the spot, and now she was frightfully upset about having been too hasty in being so independent before I had made my way in journalism a bit more, in case we shouldn't have anything to live on at all except what she's managed to save. It turned out all right in the end, because in less than half an hour after I got there she got three telegrams from other theatres—of course she had 'phoned to her press agent at once to see what he could do about it—with better offers than the one she'd thrown up, and just as I was leaving, the original man turned up to apologise. He was nearly in tears because he was afraid there would be a riot if she didn't go on, and the end of it was that he added another £40 a week if she would only consent to let bygones be bygones. But of course we didn't know how it would end when she first told me of it, and we were pretty miserable about it.

Ever since then we have both been deluged with every kind of offer you can think of if I'll only mention things in one of my articles in Truth. The first thing I found when I got home that night was a box with 500 cigars and 1,000 cigarettes of different brands, and a letter from some man with a queer foreign name offering to keep me in whatever brand I liked best for a year if I would only bring in the name of it into one of my articles so that it didn't look as if I had dragged it in on purpose, and say that it was the most delicious I had ever smoked, and that I smoked no other. I haven't answered him yet, because I felt that you would expect me to ask you about it, and in case you didn't see any objection we might share the cigars. I found one brand that was really not half bad. They are called ——, and the maker's name is ——. (If you just scratch out the names I shall understand that you don't like the idea.)

I have had quite a number of offers of the same kind since then. They were all more or less flattering; two of them spoke about "a writer of your lordship's eminence," and there was another said: "Your brilliant and witty articles in Truth," so it doesn't look as if every one thinks I am making such an ass of myself. What? They really took no end of trouble over it, too. There was one from the —— Motor Company that enclosed a whole article—already written—and very interesting I thought it was, about "Motoring as a Rest Cure," which brought their name in every second line. They offered to lend me one of their cars free for a year, and all they wanted me to do was to sign it and send it along to you as if I had written it myself. There was one that made me savage. It was from some firm that makes face powder and that sort of thing. They enclosed a blank cheque, made out to me, and never said a word about it in the letter. They wanted me to make out that Jessie's complexion—which is about the most beautiful you ever saw in your life—was got by daubing her face with some beastly stuff they manufacture. I wrote and said I wished the man that wrote that letter would call on me, because I should thoroughly enjoy kicking him. But he didn't come.

Jessie has been having just the same experience. She had a visit from a clergyman who wanted her to interest me in some charity he runs in the East End or somewhere. She says that he spoke so feelingly about the poor, starving wretches he works for that she gave him a sovereign herself, and promised to do her best to make me mention his mission in one of my articles. I think, perhaps, it might be rather a good thing. His name is the Rev. ——, of the —— Mission. [See Truth Cautionary List.—Ed.] Then the managing director of some bank that makes a business of lending money on easy terms to tradesmen and others who are temporarily inconvenienced for lack of ready cash, offered her a set of sables if she could get me to bring in something to the effect that their disinterested efforts on behalf of the needy and distressed had been basely maligned by envious slanderers. Their name is the ——. [See Truth Cautionary List.—Ed.] And some play-writer fellow sent her a long letter about having written a play that brought her and myself in, and wanting her to take a West-End theatre and get me to boom it up in Truth, and then to share the profits between us. But I see I have scarcely left myself any room for the topical article I meant to write for you this week. It is about the Suffragettes. If you will wire me as soon as you get this I will send it you by express, after I have touched it up a bit. I think it is really the best I have done yet—and so does Jessie.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

"THE English, by the English," dear Lady Betty, is a study that has never yet been undertaken; as we represent ourselves on the stage and in the novel, so are we, presumably, in real life. Allowance must, of course, be made for necessary exaggeration.

. . . . .

The peer and the "gentleman" are almost invariably represented now on our stage as semi-imbeciles, absolutely helpless, and hopelessly in debt. Those features are generally reproduced in the novels, and the applause accorded to the actor, and the approval to the author, prove that the public admit the correctness of the representations.

Neither on the stage nor in the literature of any other nation is the aristocracy of the particular community painted as being so contemptible.

The good woman was the central figure on the English stage and in our literature until a quarter of a century ago; the unselfish girl and the immaculate wife were considered to be distinctive products of Great Britain. Deceit and divorce are now the circumstances that are most frequently connected with them.

The honesty of the commercial man and of the financier—of British origin—was a feature which our writers of the past continually chose as the leading idea of their plots; the successors of the latter most generally compose their story around a criminal offence which may at any moment be exposed.

The orthodox are almost always now represented as hypocrites.

The millionaire of fiction to-day is seldom vulgar, generous, and simple-minded. He is pretentious, designing, often a criminal in disguise, and generally the villain of the piece or story.

The poor enjoy a monopoly of whatever principle remains—unless they are convicts.

The stage and the novels of a generation reflect—in a reasonably exaggerated form—the characteristics of contemporary life; did they misrepresent them they would not obtain the approval of the audiences or the readers. It appears, therefore, that the English of the time are convinced that the present generation of peers and "gentlemen" are semi-imbeciles; of women, good-for-nothing; of officers, boobies in busbies; of millionaires, scoundrels; and of the orthodox, humbugs.

That is a summary of our condition as it is generally represented on the stage and in the novels. Is there a people in the world that has given us so bad a character—or that has painted its own contemporaries so unpleasantly?

"The Interleaved Shakespeare" is a publication that is sure to attain success. The interleaves contain financial recommendations, advice regarding stocks and shares, and much interesting information in connection with City transactions. The Society for Promoting the Study of English Literature has adopted this simple device to induce the British of to-day to read our best authors. It proposes to issue shortly an edition of "The Spectator," interleaved with "society" gossip, and one of "The Vicar of Wakefield," on the interleaves of which will be provided accounts of the most exciting criminal trials of the past. For the benefit of the women, Milton's works will also be published, interleaved with fashion plates, household hints, receipts for dyeing the hair, and advice as to the treatment of husbands.

A wedding without a bridegroom is an original proposition; it is contained in the following letter:—

"The ordinary woman regards the wedding ceremony as the chief attraction of marriage; the ordinary man, as the main drawback. Is there any need for the bridegroom to be present on the occasion? Why should not the bride attend the church with her bridesmaids and surrounded with her friends, but unaccompanied by the bridegroom? A signed deed, properly attested, might be handed to the officiating clergyman, in which the bridegroom bound himself in writing, as he now does at the altar. The bride might thus enjoy all the publicity she so greatly delights in, and the bridegroom might be spared the painful experience."

The ingenuity of the modern woman has discovered a new method of earning a competence. There are horse-breakers; it has occurred to an ingenious woman that there should be husband-breakers. For a moderate fee she is prepared to make a lengthened stay, and gradually mould the newly married husband according to the pattern that his wife requires. Since Adam was driven from Paradise, man has never felt the effects of the Fall so severely as he does at the moment!—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

DURING the winter a great deal of twaddle was, as usual, printed on the subject of the nonsensical list of Winning Owners, which appears in the sporting papers at the end of every racing season. The figures in this most misleading list are all bosh, as every one knows that has even the very slightest knowledge of Turf affairs. The list simply consists of the gross sums won by the various owners in stakes. If the amounts paid for forfeits and lost or unfulfilled stakes were deducted, the alleged winnings would in a very large number of cases be converted into a startling deficit. A man with a large and heavily engaged stud often finds his stake account £1,000 to the bad after a heavy week if his horses are out of form. Of course, in order to make this annual list of any practical value, it would be necessary to calculate the original cost of the stud and the amount spent every year in keeping it up, with an adequate allowance besides for wear and tear. Then the expenditure in breeding (or buying) and training and racing the animals would have to be added to the outlay. The fact is that after all these deductions have been made a very large sum which has been nominally won, not only disappears altogether, but leaves a considerable balance on the wrong side. A great many of the owners of the present day commit the immense mistake of keeping a number of bad horses in training, instead of getting rid of them. If a horse cannot win a good-class race, let it be put into a selling plate, in which it will probably meet worse animals than it has been in the custom of running against. If an owner does not care to see his colours figuring in selling races, or if the animal is too bad to win in any company, it ought to be at once sold for whatever it will fetch. Better give the beast away than waste money on keeping it in training. There have never been more successful owners than the late Duke of Westminster and the late Lord Falmouth, and one secret of their "luck" (as it was sometimes, and most absurdly, defined) was that the foundation animals of their studs had been selected with the utmost scrutiny, and then the stable was maintained judiciously and with a generous expenditure, while (above all) it was winnowed unsparingly and with unceasing vigilance. The subscription stakes which are now so common are exceedingly expensive to owners, who enter their foals and yearlings extensively, and there is often a truly shocking waste of money through carelessness in not striking animals out of races for which they have no chance when the minor forfeit is declared.

When the Empress Marie of Russia was in England with her husband in 1873 (they were then Tsarevitch and Tsarevna) they attended Goodwood races, and were included in the late Duke and Duchess of Richmond's house party. The Tsarevitch also went to Stockbridge races on one day. At Goodwood House that year the wonderful luck of the Tsarevitch at whist was a daily topic of discussion. He was not a good player, but the run of the cards was always in his favour, and his delight at his brilliant and continued successes was quite boyish, as, of course, the sums depending on the issue of the rubber were as nothing to him. The concluding game of the week was played on the night before the party broke up by the King (then Prince of Wales) and the Tsarevitch against Sir Frederick Johnstone and Mr. George Payne. The Tsarevitch, having won two rubbers, was much elated, and he offered to bet "a monkey" or "a thousand" or "five thousand" on this one, in addition to the points and the odds. Sir Frederick Johnstone was willing to go halves with his partner in betting "a monkey," but Mr. Payne declined, and was fortunate in so doing, as the brothers-in-law carried everything before them, and won the rubber in three hands. The Tsarevitch afterwards informed his opponents that if he had won "a monkey" he would have given the money to endow a race at Goodwood in 1874.

Dean Swift is favourite for the City and Suburban at the various "lists," his price being 12 to 1. Last year Mr. Joel's horse won the handicap with 7 st. 11 lb., and he now carries 8 st. 7 lb. I do not at all fancy him for this year's race, which will probably bring out a more formidable field than was seen at Epsom last April, when the best of the starters were backward, and Dean Swift cannot have improved with an additional twelvemonth over his head. Dinneford, Polymelus, Golden Measure, and Magic Balm are next in demand, each of these horses standing at 16 to 1; and the same odds are offered against His Eminence, who, however, now appears certain to run at Lincoln. If Lord Howard de Walden's horse wins next Tuesday's race his 10 lb. penalty will stop him at Epsom, but if he is beaten at Lincoln he may nevertheless stand a good chance for the City and Suburban, as he will then be more fit than he is at present, and the course would suit him.

Galloper and Spate are the nominal favourites for the Chester Cup, each standing at 12 to 1, and next comes Catnap at 14 to 1. There is no real market on this handicap until the day of running.

The list favourites for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap are Polar Star (10 to 1) and Polymelus (12 to 1). I do not believe that either the one or the other of these horses will start for this race. Polar Star is entered for the Chippenham Plate on the last day of the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, and he is also in the Burwell Plate and in the Payne Stakes at the Second Spring Meeting. He might very likely be started for the Payne Stakes if he is then fit and well, for his 7 lb. penalty is reduced to 4 lb. by a breeding allowance, and a very moderate lot of animals are engaged in this race. Polar Star would have to give 12 lb. to All Black, unless Mr. Bailey's colt has by that time lost his right to a maiden allowance, but it is expected that this animal will turn out to be a non-stayer. Polar Star's first important engagement is the Coronation Cup at Epsom, and in that race he would have an opportunity of showing whether he is really the flyer which his friends have proclaimed him to be since he defeated Galvani in the Criterion Stakes. The field on June 6 will probably include Keystone II., Beppo, Radium, Troutbeck, The White Knight, Polymelus, and Velocity. The entry includes Spearmint and Llangibby, but (as was long ago stated in Truth) neither the one nor the other of these horses is likely to get through a severe preparation. Polar Star has escaped a penalty for the Rous Memorial Stakes at Ascot, and he is far more likely to start for that race than for the Gold Cup. A week later this colt has a nice engagement at Newcastle, where he will not have much to beat in the North Derby of £1,300 to the winner, and his penalty is reduced to 4 lb. by a breeding allowance. Later on he has another good race in the Hurst Park Lennox Plate of £1,250 to the winner, as his 9 lb. penalty is wiped out by his breeding allowance.

Any one must be perfectly infatuated of folly who now backs Polymelus for either of his handicap engagements. Mr. Joel's horse is almost certain to be kept for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, and it may be decided to reserve him for the Princess of Wales's Stakes of £6,000 at the Newmarket First July Meeting, as that race appears to be merely a question of health for him, in the absence of Spearmint and Llangibby. Black Arrow will have a great advantage in the weights, but this colt is not likely to distinguish himself over such a severe course.

Lord Falmouth, who has been spending the winter at Tregothnan, his place in Cornwall, paid a visit to Kingsclere on Thursday. The dark Derby colt, St. Martin, has been going on very well, but Waugh's horses are, of course, backward. Lord Falmouth's two-year-olds include an own brother to Quintessence and St. Martin, and the first produce of Quintessence, a colt by Orion.

A correspondent at Newmarket informs me that he will be greatly surprised if Baltinglass does not turn out to be Major Loder's best three-year-old. Weathercock, who has been under veterinary treatment for several months, is now all right again, but he is not likely to be really fit for a long time to come. Galvani is not generally liked, and he does not appear to have improved as much as could be desired. I have always regarded Galvani as an over-rated colt, for his defeat of Slieve Gallion in the Middle Park Plate, about which such an elaborate noise was raised, ought not to be regarded, as the favourite was altogether out of form when he started for that race. Galvani has two engagements shortly before the Derby, both at Hurst Park, and he might be started for the Whitsuntide Plate of £1,000 on May 20, as a miserably bad lot of animals are engaged (apart from My Pet II., who will be in France) and Major Loder's colt has no penalty.

The statement in certain journals that Carnegie was "quietly backed" for the Imperial Hurdle Race at Sandown Park is utterly untrue. The success of Lord Carnarvon's horse was a most complete surprise to every one connected with him, and he was not backed for sixpence by the stable, or, so far as is known, by any one whatever. On public form the odds against Carnegie were incalculable.

Flaxman has been struck out of the Grand National Steeplechase, so the King's colours will not be seen at Aintree next week. After Flaxman's grievously ignominious performance at Sandown Park, he could not stand any earthly chance for the Grand National. This horse has proved a very bad investment for his Majesty.

Of the horses which were beaten in Carnegie's race at Sandown Park, Mr. Whistler is likely to win before long, as he ran very creditably. Savernake, who was heavily backed, is said to have given his rider a great deal of trouble, and he also ought to improve on this form very shortly, but I fancy he has a temper.

Carnegie bids fair to do well as a hurdle-racer, but he was a dreadful failure on the flat, and a great deal of money must have been lost over him last season, when he was beaten six times, and in two of these races he started first favourite. Carnegie was much talked of last autumn as a likely horse to win the Cambridgeshire, which was an amazing fairy tale. Lord Carnarvon purchased him during the autumn of 1905 for £1,500.

There are a large number of English entries for the Grand Steeplechase de Paris, value £5,400, which is to be run at Auteuil on Sunday, June 9, including Mr. H. Browne's John M.P., Captain Wood's Prince Royal, Mr. J. A. de Rothschild's '45, Captain Foster's Kingship, Mr. S. Joel's Whitechapel, Mr. A. P. Cunliffe's Jack Spratt, Sir Peter Walker's Albuana, Captain Wood's Amersham, Mr. H. Hartigan's Domino, Mr. F. Bibby's Monsieur Beaucaire, Mr. Singer's Heatree, Mr. C. Bewicke's Old Fairyhouse, Major Loder's Maggio, and Mr. Parr's Judas and Faithless Lad. This is the richest steeplechase in Europe, and the distance is four miles. It is a weight-for-age event, the only penalty being 7 lb. for the winner of either the Grand National Steeplechase or the Grand Steeplechase de Paris.

The Auteuil Grand Hurdle Race of £2,000, which is run on Wednesday, June 12 (distance three miles and a furlong), has also obtained a large subscription from England, including his Majesty's Nulli Secundus, Mr. T. Clyde's Cinders, Captain Wood's Roseate Dawn, and Amersham, Mr. Kerne's Sancho, Mr. J. W. Dugdale's Crathorne, Mr. Prentice's Karakoul, and Dalharco, Mr. Joel's Whitechapel, Mr. G. Walmsley's Longcroft and Wild Aster, Mr. MacMahon's Mistral Boy, Mr. Hartigan's Dafila, Mr. A. B. Walker's Round Dance, Mr. Stedall's Kolo and Olitzka, and Captain Foster's Kingship. This also is a weight-for-age event, the penalty of 7 lb. being imposed only on any winners of the Grand National, the Grand Steeplechase, or the Grand Hurdle Race.

It is a pity that post entries should be permitted for any race whatever on any terms. In both of the Auteuil events "second entries" may be made by Tuesday, May 28, the cost being £100 for the steeplechase and £50 for the Hurdle Race. In the late 'sixties post entries were tried for a short time in the Ascot Cup, thanks to which arrangement Sabinus won that race in 1870, but such a clamour arose from many of the principal owners and trainers that the innovation was discontinued, and there has never been any serious idea of reviving it in connection with any English stake.

The Goodwood Cup has been a failure for some years past, the fields having been usually composed of wretchedly bad horses. It was a mistake to close and name for such a race nearly three years before it was run, and this error has now been rectified. Entries for this year's Cup will close next Tuesday, and there ought to be a large subscription, as £1,000 is added, bonâ fide, as at Ascot, and there is a sweepstake of £20 each, half forfeit to the fund. The conditions as to penalties are satisfactory.

Very few of the horses which will run at Lincoln next week can by any possibility be properly fit, and backers will do well to exercise extreme caution in their speculations, or the first meeting of the season will prove a veritable Moscow campaign for them.

It usually happens that horses win at Lincoln simply because they are more forward in condition than opponents of better class, which "lose" them a few weeks later on in the season. Last year Velocity, on his summer and autumn form, would have walked in for the Lincolnshire Handicap with 7st. 12lb., instead of finishing nowhere. I am told by a sound judge that Kaffir Chief and Cyclops Too are about the best-trained horses at Newmarket, and that, in his opinion, the representative of the stable will beat all the lot from that place. They are both very moderate horses, but superior condition may enable the trusted one to pull through. As to the "country" horses, I have heard a good account of Crusader. Nobody ought to venture a penny on this race without being assured that the animal which he is backing is tolerably fit, and the event should be left alone until the numbers are up. There is quite likely to be a revolution in the betting when some of the animals now fancied are seen in the paddock at Lincoln.

There are eighty-seven entries for the Brocklesby Stakes. I have not heard of any reliable trials in which the two-year-olds have been successful. It is inconceivable that such animals can be anything like fit as yet, after the hard winter; and the early form is certain to be altogether unreliable.

I have been much amused by reading the financial statement of the Cyclists' Touring Club. I have no intention to worry my readers with the details of these accounts. Some years ago I went into the matter thoroughly. The present position is exactly what I should have anticipated would come to pass from the state of affairs at the date when I criticised them. The committee has been going into matters, and retrenchments on salaries amounting to £500 a year are to take place. I have absolutely no sympathy with Mr. Shipton in the reduction of £200 which he suffers. It is the consequence of want of foresight and business prudence. I am very sorry for the others whose small salaries are severely docked. As a matter of fact, I do not consider that any of these salaries, including the secretaries', as at present paid, are excessive, if the work is properly and capably done. The fault really lies with the management. The Gazette is not registered as a newspaper. There is no reason why it should not be. People might join the club by means of that advertisement if they had the paper thrown in. Of course, different rates of subscription should be required if the Gazette has to be posted abroad. Then, all members requiring written replies to correspondence should prepay addressed envelopes for replies. As for the councillors and their £440 a year for travelling expenses, this is pure waste. A limited board of directors is all that is required, elected perhaps by the members. There has been too much waste in the management. The folk that have been running the show have been themselves singularly incapable. There has been much too much bunkum talked about the word "club." To Mr. Shipton and his friends it has been, like "Mesopotamia," a blessed word. All that cyclists want is a sound business organisation, to look after their interests and to give them a decent Gazette once a month. They do not want to be bothered with "consuls" and "councillors" and "presidents," and they do not want money wasted on convening meetings and printing huge quantities of agenda papers.

The general meeting of the club was lengthy and lively. The Hon. Gilbert Coleridge carried his resolution condemning the management and securing the appointment of a committee to go into affairs. The resolution condemned the existing organisation of the secretarial and editorial staff, and pledged the committee to present a scheme of reorganisation. I am very glad indeed that this resolution was carried. The authorities have persistently set their backs up against the Reformers. A letter from the hon. secretary of the Reform Committee in the Gazette evokes a caustic comment from the secretary-editor Mr. Shipton. The meeting was described as "a well attended meeting," by the secretary. The editor notes that only twenty-seven were present, and they were specially invited. But they meant business and they carried their resolution. Under the circumstances Mr. Shipton gets a rap over the knuckles, which is well deserved. I know that to him the club as an organisation is due. For a certain amount of business capacity credit is due to him. But he has turned a deaf ear to reforms, and the club has suffered. At the same time, it is much stronger than most people would imagine. I feel sure that it would receive a great deal more public support if people were satisfied that it was run on business lines. The "councillors" at the meeting promptly signed a requisition with the object of defeating Mr. Coleridge. They demand a postal vote of the club—a very unwise proceeding.

By the way, I see that the club reports at portentous length the case it laid before counsel, and his opinion as to appealing from the decision of His Honour Judge Bray, that the owner of a fowl that upsets a cyclist is not liable. The fowl flew into the spokes of the bicycle, so that, I presume the bicycle originally upset the fowl. It is not for me to teach either counsel or the C.T.C. any law, but I may remind them that the Divisional Court has held that the owner of a blind dog was not liable when the dog, wandering on the highway, upset the cyclist. This decision seems to me conclusive. Neither a dog nor a chicken is an animal feræ naturæ, so that the elephant case will not apply. By the way, it appears to be a funny kind of business to publish counsel's opinion in a case under appeal. The dealer at bridge does not generally expose his hand.

Last week both the University crews disappointed their friends. Oxford, in a row from Chiswick to Putney, quite failed to do themselves justice against a couple of scratch crews that rowed with them. At the start, Thames kept with them for quite a long while, and at the finish London passed them for a considerable distance. Cambridge, when going over the whole course, had done much better against crews from these clubs, which were quite as strong as those that rowed against Oxford. Then Cambridge on Saturday did a rather ragged mile. For the life of me I cannot make out why they have been indulging in gallery starts at over forty a minute and then dropping suddenly to thirty-six and thirty-two. No doubt it is a nice piece of exhibition work for stroke, but anything more calculated to knock to pieces the heavy men in the crew I cannot conceive. It is not as though they kept at high pressure for half-a-mile to get a lead, and to keep it so that the crew might have a breather. They drop away at once. Their performance on Saturday was limited to a more rational start at thirty-nine. But the whole row was scarcely satisfactory. They are, as a crew, slow into the water, and their finish is dirty. They have been suffering to some extent from their stroke, who is a plucky and a good waterman, but by no means an ideal oarsman. They ought to have been a first-class crew, and they are not. Oxford are quite as much trained on as Cambridge. In fact, they have been given rather lighter work. They are a neat crew to look at, and with five old Etonians they are, of course, good watermen. But there is a sad lack of devil in their rowing.

The Right Hon. R. McKenna, M.P., will be in the chair at the dinner after the race. It is just twenty years ago since he rowed bow in the winning Cambridge crew. He also rowed bow of the winning Grand for the Hall at Henley in 1886 and 1887, as well as in the winning Stewards four in the latter year. He rowed with Swann in the Pairs, which were won by Muttlebury and Barclay. C. J. Bristow, who stroked the crew, and was President of the club, is now a school inspector under the Board of Education, of which Mr. McKenna is President. The positions are changed. I trust I may be forgiven for repeating the following story:—Mr. McKenna confided to an old rowing friend that he had thought out when at the dinner in 1887, the sort of speech he would make if he ever took the chair. He is satisfied that it was quite a good one, but he cannot remember it.

Lacrosse and athletics have muchly benefited at Oxford by the Rhodes scholarships. They beat Cambridge for the first time at Lacrosse, and I fancy they will win the sports easily. The L.A.C. team took a team up to Cambridge and tied with the University. Powell, the president, is hurdling in splendid form. Cornish, the old Oxford Blue, cleared 22 ft. in the long jump. It is to be hoped that he will be able to spare time for training this year. He has filled out, and he should be able to do a clinking quarter.

At Monte Carlo there has been something like a revolution. Ritchie has beaten Laurie Doherty at lawn tennis by three sets to love; the games were 8-6, 7-5, 8-6. The Americans, as well as the Australians, are challenging for the Dwight-Davis bowl. The Trade Reform selection committee of the Lawn Tennis Association will now be able to sweep out the old gang.

The unexpected happened in the boxing and fencing competition between the Universities. Cambridge came out winners by the odd event. The Corn Exchange was crowded. There was sound and plucky boxing. But I do hope that undergraduates will remember not to cheer during the rounds. The timekeeper's voice was practically drowned. It is very bad form to cheer, and such interruptions are not permitted at any boxing show. I know the cheers were but the ebullition of youthful zeal and innocence. The present generation is ignorant of the old prize-ring traditions.

At Rugby football Ireland was simply overwhelmed by Wales at Cardiff. I see in the press that David, the Welsh half, was allowed to put the ball into the scrimmage in such a way that the Welsh forwards practically got the ball on every possible occasion. For this the referee has been severely blamed by at least one writer. The Welsh outsides were in splendid form, and simply ran through the Irish defence.

There was a crowd of 30,000 people to see the match between Newcastle United and the Corinthians at Fulham, for the Sheriff's Charity Shield. The Northerners won a most interesting game. They played for bare expenses, and the Fulham folk gave the ground for nothing. These numbers did not prevent as big a crowd going to the Palace to see the cupholders, Everton, draw with the local team. Woolwich Arsenal were the only team to win away from home. They beat Barnsley by two goals to one, and, singularly enough, all the goals were scored by the team playing uphill.

At the London Caledonian F.C. coming of age dinner, Lord Kinnaird opined that, although there were 200,000 amateur footballers, there were 5,000 professionals whom he considered deserving of consideration. This is quite true, but it is no reason for running the Football Association and its subordinate branches solely in the interests of those who do not play the game, but run professional teams. The professional player is the last person considered by the Football Association.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE exhibition of commercial vehicles and motor-boats at Olympia is a sign of the times not to be overlooked. It is quite reasonable to think that eventually the supply of self-driven vehicles of the industrial class will constitute the more important branch of the industry as a whole, for the simple reason that vehicles of this kind must always outnumber those required by private owners; and it is doubtless shrewd perception of this fact which has induced so many firms who have been mainly associated hitherto with the manufacture of private cars to turn their attention to those of the more matter-of-fact description now on view at Olympia. From the standpoint of the trader the advantage of such vehicles over the horse-drawn article is obvious enough in many ways, though there is, of course, the difficulty that, whereas any intelligent youth can take charge of a horse and cart without much risk, this hardly applies in the case of a motor vehicle. Extra labour in the shape of trained drivers is necessitated, therefore, in many instances. But even so, the gain resulting from the employment of the motor-van or dray or what not is in the long run enormous on account of its vastly greater efficiency in the matter of distance and speed. Some very striking particulars under this head were recently published by Messrs. Harrod, and their experience is doubtless that of all other large firms.

In the case of the motor 'buses, unfortunately, the tale is so far hardly so satisfactory. On every hand complaints are to be heard of the unsatisfactory financial results now attending their working. At present nearly all of them are being run at a loss, and it is plain that the cost of upkeep must undergo much further reduction before they can be regarded as a wholly satisfactory business proposition. From the outsider's point of view, one obvious way of meeting the situation would seem to be to raise the existing fares, which are in general ridiculously low. For 'buses going about double the speed of the older kind the public might well be charged on a higher scale. As it is, under the pressure of competition, the tendency has been rather in the other direction, with the result that the whole industry at the present time is in the doldrums. Under the circumstances, it is hardly a happy suggestion that the County Council should be invited to add to their present undertakings by starting additional motor 'bus services, and the proposal comes with curious inconsistency from those who have been foremost in denouncing the Council's action in taking over the trams. A vast amount of nonsense has, of course, been put forth under the latter head. There is not the slightest doubt that the County Council tramway services will prove in due course a most valuable source of revenue, and the attempts which have been made in some quarters to discredit them, and to hold up the motor 'bus as the ideal form of public service vehicle, are doomed to sure and certain failure. The truth of the matter is that each kind of service is good in its way, and that with the population of London increasing as it does, there will be plenty of work for both in due course.

Will the new Secret Commissions Act kill the particular form of bribery and corruption rife in the motor trade? It is too early to speak at present with confidence on this point, but if it does it will prove a good deal more effective than some previous legislative efforts of a similar order. Meanwhile, attention has been directed to certain practices which have been regarded as attempts at circumvention of the Act, as, for instance, the printed notification sent round to their customers by a well-known firm of coachbuilders. This runs to the effect that as their practice in the past has always been to bestow gratuities on the employees of their customers, they propose to continue doing this in future. Earl Russell has, however, pointed out that the remedy for this on the part of the automobilist objecting to his servant receiving such gratuities is very simple. All he has to do on receiving such a notification is to reply requesting the discontinuance of the practice in the case of his servant. If, after this, the firm still persists in distributing its largesse, it will bring both itself and the recipients forthwith under the provision of the new law.

This is the season when motorists who have bought new cars realise the delightful uncertainty which attends their delivery. They have paid their deposits of one-third of the purchase price, the promised day of delivery has long since passed, yet they do not receive their eagerly awaited treasures; and, what is worse, they can do little or nothing to expedite matters. Speaking generally, the buyer is completely in the hands of the makers, and there is no doubt that serious cause for grievance often results. The deposit system in itself, whereby a big firm holds thousands of pounds of other people's capital for an indefinite period without paying a farthing of interest thereon, is decidedly open to criticism. It is argued by the manufacturers that it is necessary for their security, while the plea has been advanced, also, that it is good for the industry as a whole, since it enables firms to trade with a smaller capital than otherwise. Neither argument is, however, very convincing.

At least all firms who require such substantial advances should on their side be prepared to enter into a more binding obligation in the matter of delivery than is customary at present. Some—to their credit be it noted—do this, of course, as, for example, Messrs. S. F. Edge, Ltd., who, I believe, pledge themselves to deliver on the appointed date under penalty of a substantial fine for every subsequent day's delay. But even this arrangement is capable of being circumvented. Messrs. Edge, I am confident, would not lend themselves to such a practice, but in the case of certain Continental firms it not infrequently occurs that a purchaser enters into such an agreement but is kept waiting as long as ever for his car. What happens is that some other purchaser comes along, with plenty of money, little scruple, and a very ardent desire to get a new car, and he snaps up the one which was bespoken, and indemnifies the maker for the penalties incurred.

The recent debate at the Automobile Club—now, by the way, the Royal Automobile Club—on the respective merits of steam and petrol was interesting and instructive, though it is hardly likely perhaps that the opinions of a single individual were altered thereby. The friends of steam and the partisans of petrol will remain, when all is said and done, of the same opinion still—and not altogether unnaturally, since nowadays, so far as practical results are concerned, it is so very much a case of six of one and half-a-dozen of the other. Formerly it was not so, of course, and petrol then got a start which has been of inestimable value to it. In those days steam was handicapped by its greater intricacy, greater liability to derangement, excessive weight, the necessity of constantly filling up with water, and so on. To-day there is no doubt that the finest steam cars, such as the White, give results equal in every respect to the best of the petrol makes, with certain advantages in addition which even the finest of the latter cannot claim. Yet even so, fashion has fastened its affections on the petrol article, and though it is hardly to be denied that theoretically the balance of advantage rests with its rival, it is hardly likely to be superseded. None the less, there is not the slightest doubt that there is still an enormous future for steam. A really good small steam car in particular would probably find a very ready market. But all the bigger firms are too busy at present catering for the wealthy to bother about the needs of the smaller fry.

MAMMON.

An Unsatisfactory Week in the Stock Markets—The Unsettling Influence of the Yankee Slump—The Public's Losses Small—A Rich Man's Panic—Dear Money and its Effect upon Security Values—New Loans Another Depressing Factor—The Japanese Conversion Issue—Forthcoming Argentine Loan.

THE past week in the Stock Exchange was marked by heavy liquidation in one or two markets, by stagnation in most departments, and by a shrinkage in values practically everywhere. The two evil influences at work have been New York and new loans. It is some time since American railways have been subjected to such heavy liquidation or experienced such violent movements, and the slump occurring on top of the recent Harriman disclosures and the frantic rush of the railroads to secure capital, has produced an uneasy feeling in market circles, which, so far as it relates to the financial position of individuals, was probably overdone. It is one of the consoling features of the recent fall in Americans that the public—and particularly the British public—has been very little hit. The wild boom that culminated last autumn in the firework display by the Pacific crowd was a matter that in the main concerned a few operators in Wall Street. The public was some time previously scared out of the market, and each successive rise only caused it to hold more resolutely aloof. The game then was left to a few individuals, who, failing in their efforts to unload upon the public, have been forced by inability to renew loans, to unload upon themselves. These men are so wealthy that there is little need to worry about their ability to bear the losses they are now being compelled to incur. Thus far, then, it would be easy to magnify the effect of the slump in Yankees, but the bearing which the present unsatisfactory state of the New York market has upon the monetary situation here is of the greatest importance to the City. Largely because of the continued stringency on the other side of the Atlantic, and the fear of gold withdrawals from Europe, our Bank Rate has had to be maintained at the high level of 5 per cent., with no prospect of early relief.

Of course, it would be wrong to blame the United States for all our troubles. As I have pointed out several times lately, trade is at present so wonderfully active practically the world over that the demand for currency has for the time being grown at a faster pace than the supply. It is one of the penalties London must pay as the financial centre of the world, and the one free market for gold, that she should feel most directly this international clamouring for increased currency facilities. With the value of money so high, it is inevitable that prices of securities should be affected. At the same time investors should remember that the prevailing dearness of money is unlikely to last for any great length of time. Before very long trade is bound to react, and when it does, the Money Market will be quick to feel the relief. Then we may look for the tide of security values to turn in the opposite direction, and those who hold good-class stocks acquired at anything like the present level may expect to begin reaping the benefit. I referred at the outset to new loans as another factor prejudicing the market for existing stocks at the present juncture. During the last few days the Japanese Five per Cent. Loan of £23,000,000 for the conversion of the Six per Cent. Customs bonds has been placed, one-half in London and the other half in Paris. Seeing that the new bonds were offered at 99½, thus yielding a clear 5 per cent., there was no doubt about their being taken by the public. At the same time, I am not surprised that some people were inclined to draw comparisons between the relative price of the new Fives and those for Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. Loans. Doubtless the new issue is good enough, but, unlike the bonds which it will redeem, it has been given no special hypothecation. The Four and a Halfs, on the other hand, which at the present price yield only about ⅛ per cent. less than the Fives, are specially secured by a first charge upon the Government Tobacco Monopoly, and therefore they are naturally preferred by many investors. Now that the Japanese Loan is out of the way, the City is likely to witness an early issue on behalf of the Argentine Government. The total loan wanted is £7,000,000, which is required to fund the Treasury Bills created in connection with the redemption of the Six per Cent. Funding Loan in January, 1906. The new bonds will bear 5 per cent. interest, and be offered at 97½. Two and a half millions will be reserved for London, and the remainder will be offered on the Continent.

Renewed Weakness in Home Railways — Excellent Traffics and Trade Returns Ignored—Scotch Railway Dividends—Ghastly North British and Caledonian Results—The "Ayrshire" and Highland Performances.

The little revival in Home Rails recorded a week ago has not been allowed to make much headway. Owing to the disturbance occasioned by the break in Americans, and to preparations for new loans, all investment securities have during the past week moved unfavourably, and Railway stocks, as a consequence of their narrow market, proved specially susceptible, as may be seen from the following table:—

Traffic returns, as regards the trade lines, again made a very fine showing, and additional evidence, if it were needed, of the vitality of our leading industries was furnished by the Board of Trade returns for February. The market, however, is at the moment not in the mood to pay attention to news of the kind, though, of course, the steady growth in earnings must exercise its logical effect later on. A bad impression was created by the Scotch Railway dividends, which, it must be confessed, in the case of the two leading systems equalled the worst estimates. There is, however, no particular reason why these declarations should cause alarm to holders of English Railway stocks, for the methods of finance that have produced such startling results have been peculiar to the companies north of the Tweed, the reckless capital expenditure indulged in across the Border being quite unparalleled amongst the English lines.

The worst showing of all was that of the North British. This company is paying ½ per cent. per annum upon the deferred, as against 2 per cent. a year ago, which makes the dividend for 1906-7 only 1 per cent., as against 1¾ per cent. for both 1904-5 and 1905-6. The reduction involves £90,000, and this notwithstanding that published traffics showed an increase of £15,100. In other words, about £105,000 has vanished, and to learn where it has gone it is necessary to wait for the report. Of course, there was the Arbroath accident, but that surely did not account for anything like so large a total; evidently there must have been a serious addition to working expenses and to interest charges. The dividend is the worst paid by the North British since 1900, and affords a strange contrast to the results recently made known by the leading English "trade" lines, several of which made the best showing at least for six years. The question may well be asked, if this be a sample of what the British can do when trade is good, what will happen when the lean times come round again. If anything further were needed to complete the disgust of the market, it could be found in the fact that for some years previously the North British had been pursuing a policy of spending more freely out of revenue upon the up-keep of its property, and therefore there seemed to be the less room for any sudden advance in outgoings. The decline that occurred last week in North British stocks was accompanied by a rumour that the board was seeking to place £2,000,000 of Three per Cent. Debenture stock at 85. The terms may not be exactly as stated, but there is unfortunately too much reason to believe that the company is wanting more capital; indeed, it appears to have already tried to place a portion of the stock by offering it free of stamp and fee upon the market.

Hardly less gloomy is the half-yearly showing of the Caledonian. This company is paying at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum on its ordinary stock, as against 4¼ per cent. for the corresponding half-year, which gives the deferred stock ½ per cent. as compared with 1¼ per cent. The balance forward is practically unaltered. For the full year 1906-7 the dividends on Caledonian ordinary and deferred will have been 3⅝ and ⅝ per cent. respectively, as against 4 per cent. and 1 per cent. for 1905-6. The reduction in dividend represents £69,000, but there was not quite the same mystery as to where the money had gone as in the case of the British. To begin with, £10,000 less was brought into the half-year, while an extra £24,500 was required to meet the interest on the £1,222,832 of 4 per cent. convertible preference stock issued in the early part of last year. Thus £34,500 out of the £69,000 is accounted for, but, nevertheless, there is solid ground for dissatisfaction at the performance. According to the report, while gross receipts expanded by £15,000, there was an advance of no less than £43,500 in working expenses. For a long time past loud complaints have been uttered in the press and at the meetings of the company against the latter's prodigality in the matter of capital expenditure. In five years the aggregate capitalisation of the line has risen from 49½ millions to 55 millions sterling, and proof that this advance of 5½ millions in capitalisation has not benefited the proprietors may be found in the fact that the ordinary dividend has fallen in the same period from 4 to 3⅝ per cent. Under the circumstances the stockholders are likely to chafe at the special circular just issued by the company asking authority for a Provisional Order to create further capital for "general purposes."

The Glasgow and South Western completes the trio of misfortune, its ordinary dividend having to be reduced from 1¾ to 1¼ per cent., which makes the annual payment on the deferred 1½ per cent. as compared with 1⅝ per cent. for the preceding twelvemonth. In this case, however, there is less room for criticism, because the company states that it has set aside £15,800 in respect of the Saltcoats Station accident, and but for this necessary provision the dividend could have been maintained. Gross receipts showed an increase of £18,000, but this gain was swallowed up by additional working expenses. The little Highland shares with the Great North of Scotland the distinction of being able to maintain its rate of dividend. The distribution recommended is again 2 per cent. per annum, making 1¾ per cent. for the twelvemonth. Traffic receipts as estimated showed an increase of nearly £5,000. The balance carried out is £10,100, as compared with £8,800, but the merit of this is spoilt by the fact that the amount brought into the half-year was £1,800 larger than the year before.

Sensational Slump in Americans—Repetition of the Panic of 1903—The Government and the Railroads—The Overdose of New Issues—Unfavourable January Earnings—A Pennsylvania Forecast.

Throughout last week the American Market was in the throes of liquidation of a more pressing character than has been witnessed for a long time past, and values have slumped with tremendous violence. On one occasion the day's transactions in Wall-street aggregated 2,357,000 shares, which was the largest turnover since the Harriman coup of August last. Save for one brief rally—due to mysterious and heavy buying of Reading shares—the "bears" had matters all their own way throughout the week. The extent of the declines may be gathered from the following table:—

It is so far fortunate that the collapse is not one that directly involves the general public on either side of the Atlantic. The riot of speculation that preceded the present break was conducted by a comparatively few individuals, whose methods were so flagrant as to effectually repel the public they were seeking to attract. These men have now been obliged by force of circumstances to throw their securities upon the market, and the commotion they have caused recalls the rich man's panic of 1903, when many of the largest capitalists having so over-extended their commitments were obliged to throw stocks overboard regardless of prices.

There has been nothing that could be described as fresh news to account for the latest fall; the weakness arises rather from the development of the various adverse influences with which my readers are now familiar. Wall-street has been spared further disclosures of Railroad financial methods before the Inter State Commerce Commission, but the belief that this inquiry was simply a preliminary to action by the Federal Government is keeping alive a feeling of nervousness in market circles. Of course, it will be a month or two before the report of the investigation is laid before President Roosevelt, and after that any recommendations put forward can only be carried into effect through the medium of the courts—a procedure that must inevitably be slow in arriving at an ultimate outcome. Still, it is becoming evident that the policy of the Government is to probe to the bottom of public grievances against the railroads, and accordingly the market is rendered liable to frequent disturbance from rumours of new legislative action. Last week it was stated that the Government was about to follow up its investigation of the Harriman group by a similar inquiry into the finances of the Hill Roads, and the story helped to quicken the downward pace in Hill stocks. There has been a comparative cessation of new short term note issues during the week. Apparently most of the leading railroads have now completed their capital arrangements for the present, while companies of second-rate importance—although many of them are known to be badly in need of funds—find themselves unable to obtain money except on ruinous terms. Of course, it is the congested state of the security market as a consequence of the frequent big additions to the floating debt of the railroads that is primarily responsible for the present demoralisation. Since the beginning of the year over $250,000,000 of short term notes have been created, without taking into consideration new stock and bond issues. Is it any wonder under such circumstances that there has been wholesale liquidation of stocks on the part of banks and financial houses wanting to take up lines of these new notes?

Despite the large amount of money recently raised by the railroads, lately, there is no doubt that it does not represent a tithe of the total needed for improvements and extensions. Many of the companies have publicly announced their intention to curtail their expenditure on new construction work to a minimum pending a return to cheaper money and lower prices for materials. People naturally regard this as a forewarning for a general industrial reaction, and there is no doubt that it will exercise an important effect upon industry, and consequently upon railroad gross earnings a little later on. The matter is receiving all the more attention from the market because of the recent serious effect upon net earnings produced by the rise in wages and materials. Two January statements that caused considerable comment were those of the Louisville and Southern. The former, while having an advance in gross earnings of no less than $358,000, registered an actual decline in net earnings of $28,000. The Southern, while coming out with a gain of $63,000 in gross receipts, had to put up with a drop of $440,000 in net takings. Looking at the January results more broadly, while the gross earnings rose by $4,638,000, an increase of 6 per cent., net receipts were down $1,848,000, or 8 per cent. The Southern has managed to pay its preferred dividend again at the full rate, but the market is beginning to raise doubts about the maintenance of the full dividend much longer. The Pennsylvania report for the year ended December 31 has also been subjected to severe criticism. According to the Financial News, a large commission house has sent out a letter to its customers saying that, on the basis of the report for 1906, there is every reason to expect that the showing for 1907 will be very bad. "The railroad," says the letter, "is earning about 10 per cent. on its common stock according to the report; but this year allowance will have to be made for increased wages, the higher cost of materials and operating expenses generally, which represent fully $12,000,000. This amount must be deducted from the net earnings of the last twelve months, leaving $19,000,000, or less than 6½ per cent. on the common stock. Furthermore, the company has disposed of a large part of the treasury stocks, which means that the income will be largely reduced in 1907."

HEAVY LIQUIDATIONS OF CANADIAN PACIFICS—THE INFLUENCE OF WALL STREET—CANADIAN RAILWAY TRAFFICS—ARGENTINE RAILS—A YIELD OF 6 PER CENT. ON B.A. AND PACIFIC—THE NEW BUENOS AYRES MIDLAND RAILWAY.

The blighting influence of Wall Street has effectually checked the rally in Canadian rails. The shares of the Canadian-Pacific, which in the late American boom received a big share of attention from speculators in the United States, have been subjected to a fresh bout of heavy liquidation, and the price has been tossed about like a shuttlecock during the whole week. The Continent joined in the selling chorus, more particularly Berlin, and at one time rumours of failures were reported from that centre, though the stories were promptly shown to be untrue. While speculators who have been trading beyond their depth are being compelled to disgorge, the market must continue in an unsettled state, but the break that has lately occurred ought not to shake the faith of the real holder. The company has now passed the "lean patch" in the matter of earnings that was occasioned by bad weather, and is resuming its former steady rate of expansion. Seeing that net earnings last half-year from the railway alone were equal to more than 16 per cent., there is no question about the maintenance of dividends; the only doubt seems to be as to how long before a higher rate be paid. The Grand Trunk Railway continues to forge ahead in the matter of gross earnings. For the last week of February the line recorded an increase of £3,100—following on top of an advance of £10,100 in the corresponding week of 1906—and thus for the first two months of the year the railway has registered an improvement of £99,400, equal to nearly 9 per cent. The other leading Canadian railway—the Canadian Northern—showed an increase in gross takings for the last seven days of February of $12,900. This brings the aggregate increase since July 1 to $1,246,200, equal to 37.15 per cent.; but there has been an increase of mileage in operation equal to 21.6 per cent. The severe winter, described by the company as "unprecedented in the history of Canada," has done much to spoil the net receipts of the line. In January, for instance, gross receipts declined by $8,500 and working expenses rose $149,700, so that net revenue fell off by $158,200. In consequence, the increase in net receipts since July 1 has been pulled down to $169,500. However, with the advent of milder weather, the company should now begin to go ahead again in the matter of both gross and net earnings.

Argentine rails have, with most other foreign railway stocks, pursued a dwindling tendency during the week. The recent reports of serious damage to the maize crop from drought and locusts have assisted to depress values, but in the main the fall may be accounted for by the adverse influences common to all Stock Exchange securities. Were monetary conditions brighter, it is extremely unlikely that prices would be allowed to crumble as they have lately, even though maize has been damaged to the extent suggested in some quarters. The leading companies already have such big gross traffic increases standing to their credit, and they are, moreover, in such a strong financial position—thanks to the dividend limitation policy pursued during the last few years of marvellous prosperity—that there is little fear about the maintenance of dividends, even allowing for the additions to capital made during the last few months. Perhaps one of the cheapest stocks in the group is Buenos Ayres and Pacific. At the present price the yield is a clear 6 per cent. There is no likelihood of the dividend going above the present 7 per cent. level, but the company should be in a position at the end of the current financial year to again make liberal appropriations to reserve and renewal funds, and thereby further add to the value of the stock as an investment. According to the Buenos Ayres Herald, the enterprise of the Pacific Railway, as shown in its methods of informing the public as to what is to be seen along its line and the lines of its Western connections and in the Andes, is being richly rewarded by a very substantial increase in the through and long-distance passenger traffic. In the same way the local traffic is being increased, and scores of houses are being built at near-by stations on the local section. The local train service is described as excellent, the trains run on the schedule time without vexatious and unaccountable delays, the passenger tariff has been reduced to a minimum scale of charges, and season ticket holders are given the privilege of paying three, six, or twelve months in advance, and thereby securing a further and very substantial reduction.

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

OPTIONS AT LOW RATES can be obtained from the CENTRAL STOCK EXCHANGE, LTD. (Established 1893), 66, Cannon-street, London, E.C. List post free to any applicant.

ACTIVITY AMONG SOUTH AFRICANS STILL CONFINED TO THE DIAMOND FAVOURITES—GOLD SHARES QUIET AND IRREGULAR—THE RANDFONTEIN SCRIP DIVIDEND—TRANSVAAL GOLD OUTPUT FOR FEBRUARY.

In the Kaffir market activity has continued to be confined to diamond descriptions. In these a very fair volume of business has been transacted during the past week, and prices have shown considerable fluctuation. De Beers have been persistently offered on any advance to the neighbourhood of 30, while Jagers have been a rather dull market, possibly owing to some disappointment at the statement that the next dividend will not be at an increased rate. However these shares are expected to go ahead before long, and if anticipations with respect to the company's earnings in the financial year due to commence next month be realised, a purchase at the present level should prove remunerative. Premiers, in which interest was revived by the issue of the directors' report, have continued an active counter, and have been helped by the February return and by the news of the discovery of a diamond of nearly 400 carats, which is stated to be of the finest water. New Vaal Rivers suffered a sharp relapse, but the fall is said to have been due to "bear" sales, and not to any unfavourable news as to the property.

Signs of a revival of outside speculative interest in Kaffir gold shares are still wanting. During the past week business remained on a comparatively small scale, operations being practically limited to professional speculators here and in Paris, and no decided general tendency was displayed. But for the unsettled state of the American market, which has had a restricting influence upon business in other departments of the Stock Exchange, it is thought Kaffirs might have made a rather better showing, although it is hardly expected that the public will resume active operations in these descriptions pending a definite pronouncement of policy by the new Transvaal Legislature, it remaining to be seen what action will be taken with respect to the Chinese on the Rand whose contracts are due to expire from June onward. Meanwhile it is very satisfactory to note that, speaking at Pretoria on Monday evening, General Botha reiterated the statements he made before the elections. He said the Ministry would devote all its efforts to encouraging and helping the mines, and that in the matter of labour no extreme measures would be taken. Below I give my usual table of Kaffir prices, showing the movement on the past month:—

Some information of particular interest to holders of shares in the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Company has come to hand by mail from Johannesburg, where the annual meeting of the company was held last month. It will be remembered that in December last the directors announced a dividend of 10 per cent. payable in the shares of subsidiary companies, but it was not stated which of the twelve subsidiaries the directors had in view. The total number of shares comprising this scrip dividend is 300,000, and it is announced that they form part of the parent company's holding in six subsidiaries; but even now shareholders are not told the names of the companies concerned. As the directors find it impossible to make an equitable distribution of the 300,000 shares as they stand, it is proposed to form a special trust, which will have a capital corresponding to the number of shares to be distributed, and holders of Randfontein Estates will be given one trust share in respect of every ten shares at present held. Those concerned will doubtless regard this as a fair way of settling the matter. Very possibly they would prefer a cash distribution, but the directors consider it would be unwise to deplete the parent company's cash until most of the subsidiary companies have been placed on a crushing footing. The annual statements of the Randfontein Estates, its subsidiaries, and the other companies connected with what is known as the Robinson group should shortly be in the hands of shareholders on this side, and at a later date, when space permits, I propose to review the results achieved by the mines of this group.

As was to be anticipated in view of the shorter month, the Chinese holidays on the 13th, 14th, and 15th ultimo, and the interruption caused by the elections, the gold output of the Transvaal mines for last month shows a falling off compared with that for January, the decrease amounting to 44,096 oz. in weight, and £187,307 in value, but it is a satisfactory feature that the average daily production last month was higher than in January. The following table gives the comparative results in fine ounces:—

* Loss.

In a few cases, it will be noticed, profits are a little larger than in January, despite February being a shorter month. On the other hand, heavy declines are shown by the East Rand subsidiaries, which also exhibited a falling off in January compared with December. The native labour return for February is very satisfactory, a gain of over 4,000 being reported, and this follows on a steady increase of late.

Rhodesians have continued a disappointing market, the general tendency having been towards a lower level of quotations. Some fresh favourable development to stimulate interest in this department is hoped for, the Chartered report and meeting, though providing evidence of satisfactory progress, having failed to give the market a fillip. The gold statistics for February are not likely to help matters owing to the shorter month.

Interest in the Westralian Market Centred mainly on Horseshoes and Fingalls—Further Decline in the Deep Leads Group.

Speculative interest in the Westralian Market during the past week centred mainly upon Golden Horseshoes and Great Fingalls. In my last notes I dealt with the revival of activity in the former shares and stated that no reason had transpired to account for the substantial advance in the quotation. Horseshoes have recently been up to over £8, and although they have dropped back below that figure it will be seen from the following table that on the week they still show a good margin in favour of holders:—

The latest suggestion in connection with the recent spurt in Horseshoes is that a prominent French speculator took advantage of the narrowness of the market in the shares to hoist the price, thinking it not unlikely that by so doing he would catch some dealers short and their purchases would enable him to get out at a satisfactory profit. At the same time, the belief that the annual report, due to be issued shortly, will make a satisfactory showing has helped to keep up the quotation. In the case of Great Fingalls, the recent relapse on the disappointment caused by the latest ore-reserves estimate has been followed by a smart recovery, the shares having been up to over 2¼ at one time during the past week. The buying, which was Colonial in origin, was accompanied by a rumour as to a favourable development having occurred in the property. The official cable published a week yesterday showed an improvement in the grade of the ore at the No. 13 (the lowest) level, while the reef in a winze sunk below that level was reported to assay 35s. per ton over a width of 4 ft. 8 in. —a payable grade. The subsequent colonial buying would seem to indicate a maintenance of the improvement in the position at depth. In other Westralians business has been on a small scale and no special feature has been presented. The Deep Leads group has experienced a further relapse in prices, the main reason for which is the continuance of the delay in reaching the deepest part of the ancient river bed at the Loddon Valley. Further cabled news has come to hand from this property, and the results announced are encouraging, but they are not from the point on which market interest is centred.

Copper Shares Continue Active and the Favourites Sharply Relapse—Zincs Very Erratic—Further Official Information—Balaghat and Ooregum Distributions—Increasing Interest in the Dharwar Goldfield—Nundydroog Position—Indian Gold Output.

Activity has continued to characterise the market in copper shares, and during the past week the "bull" movement received a check, the influence of the American situation on mining descriptions being most marked in the case of the copper group. The remaining "bears" of Tintos have found the course of the market much more to their liking than for some weeks past, for as a result of extensive realisations, largely on Continental account, the price of the shares has suffered a substantial relapse from the high record of over 109 recently touched. The position of the market in the metal has not given cause for uneasiness, and the selling of copper shares would appear to have been mainly induced by the general depression arising out of the American unsettlement, and in the event of this bugbear being removed, a fresh upward movement in the copper favourites would no doubt follow. Arizonas have suffered in sympathy with the heavier descriptions, and the relapse affords mining investors a favourable opportunity to acquire an interest in the undertaking. The February return of 1,286 tons of copper was satisfactory, allowing for the shorter month, and it is expected that the current month's production will reach the long-hoped-for record of 1,500 tons. In the event of such a monthly output being secured and maintained up to the end of September, it is considered probable that the company will be able to show much better dividend results than the rate distributed in respect of the year ended September last, which was 105 per cent. In the Australian group of copper shares, Great Cobars have participated in the general downward tendency, the recent sharp rise in the quotation having been followed by profit-taking realisations and "bear" sales.

Zinc Corporations have continued to monopolise attention in the Broken Hill group. Dealings in these shares have again been on an extensive scale, and the price has fluctuated widely, the extremes having been 26s. 6d. and 33s. 6d. On Thursday last dealers, for a change, talked very bullishly of the undertaking, it being rumoured that private cables reported the plant to be working satisfactorily. On the following day an official cable reached London, announcing that the plant was treating 120 tons per day, a second unit, bringing the tonnage up to 240, would be started within ten days, and another unit soon after. Though satisfactory so far as it goes, the effect of this cable upon the market was adverse, dealers having expected to be told more. But holders of the shares will doubtless be reassured by this message, as obviously the directors who are visiting the works, and who are experts, would not recommend the starting of further portions of the plant were the process the utter failure market rumour has so assiduously asserted it to be. The promised further cable is awaited with considerable interest, and it is hoped it will give details as to extraction and working costs. The rumour as to a new issue of capital being contemplated has been revived, but I am informed that the directors have no proposal of the kind under consideration, the funds available being quite adequate for present requirements. The Broken Hill Mine shares have given way in price, but this has been the result of the general depression, and not of any unfavourable development in connection with the mines themselves or the metal markets. The first return of the Broken Hill South Blocks is now to hand. If the net amount given in the cable may be taken as the company's profit after the payment of working expenses, the return must be considered very satisfactory, the sum mentioned being equivalent to 30s. per ton. The mine is stated to have over 400,000 tons of ore opened up, which, at 30s. per ton profit, would represent a sum of £600,000, or £3 per share, and this estimate does not make any allowance for the value of the tailings, which will ultimately be treated by the company for their zinc contents.

A dull tendency has also characterised West African, American, Siberian, and Indian descriptions, as will be gathered from a glance at the table of prices given below:—

Further dividend declarations by Indian gold-mining companies have just been made. On Balaghats a final distribution of 1s. 9d. per share on both the ordinary and preference shares is announced, which makes the total return for 1906 the same as for 1905—namely, 3s. on the ordinary and 5s. on the preference. At the current market price the yield on the ordinary is equivalent to 16 per cent. per annum, which makes the shares appear cheap. But it must be remembered that recent developments have been poor and the rate of the output has had to be reduced, so that, unless the mine's position improves, the 1906 rate of dividends is not likely to be maintained in the current year. The Ooregum announces a balance dividend of 9d. per share on both ordinary and preference shares, making the total distribution for the past year 1s. 3d. (or 12½ per cent.) on the ordinary and 2s. 3d. (or 22½ per cent.) on the preference. The amounts are the same as were paid in respect of 1905. Shareholders in this company are also notified that the directors recommend an increase of capital to the extent of £68,500 by the creation and issue of 137,000 shares of 10s. each at par. For what purpose the new capital is required is not yet announced; details are promised when the annual report is issued in about a week's time. It is, however, surmised that the Board intends to follow the lead of the Champion Reef, Coromandel, and Mysore Companies and acquire an interest in the Dharwar district. In view of the attention being paid to this new mining field, the annual report of the Dharwar Reefs is of especial interest. This company is the most advanced, having concentrated work on one of its properties. The payable ore reserves were increased during the last twelve months by 14,247 tons, making a total of 17,686 tons. Crushing was commenced last month, and the announcement of the first "clean-up," which in all probability will be made at the end of the current month, is awaited with considerable interest. Other concerns which have acquired properties or options on properties in this district are the Goldfields of Dharwar, Dharwar Gold Mines, the Sangli Gold-Mining Company, and the Goldfields of Mysore and General Exploration Company. So far the results obtained on the new field have been of an encouraging character, and no doubt mining investors are destined to hear a good deal about it in the future. The report for 1906 of the Nundydroog Company is just to hand, and I observe that it makes a more satisfactory showing than its predecessor in regard to the amount of ore opened up in the mine, the ore reserves at the end of the past year being estimated at 73,000 tons, compared with 49,100 tons at the end of 1905. It will be gratifying to shareholders to read that the condition of the mine has much improved, and to find that the superintendent in his report expresses the opinion that the present favourable prospects of the company justify the expectation that the exploratory work of the current year will be attended by important developments. Were the ore reserves position stronger—the latest figures represent barely a year's supply for the treatment plant—Nundydroogs would be an attractive purchase among the Indian gold shares, the yield on the current price on the basis of the dividends for 1906 working out at 14 per cent. This is not quite as high as the yield on Balaghats, but then immediate prospects are brighter in the case of the Nundydroog.

The output of the Indian gold mines for February and preceding months is given in the subjoined table:—

The further falling-off in the February returns is accounted for by the shorter month and the hindrance to the Mysore's operations by the fire at the mine.

"Foundation Stones of Fortune."

This is the heading of one of the many seductively-worded advertisements that are now being issued by the International Securities Syndicate, 23, Westminster Palace-gardens, S.W. "Investing £5 to produce £5,000," is the heading of another, and all of them are cleverly designed to gammon ingenuous investors with the idea that a purchase of foreign Government and municipal premium bonds from the syndicate offers a sure road to fortune. For years past the notorious Paris firms of Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., and Melville, Glyn, and Co. have been engaged in a similarly pernicious enterprise, but in the grossness of its misrepresentations, the cunning with which it sets its trap for the unwary, and the lavishness of its expenditure on flambuoyant newspaper advertisements, this mushroom concern in Westminster completely eclipses the old-established practitioners. It may therefore be useful if I point out once more that the syndicate, like its rivals, charges prices outrageously in excess of the actual market value of the bonds which it sells, that the "combinations" which it recommends include bonds which are practically worthless, and that instead of being—as is mendaciously asserted—a safe and remunerative form of investment, a purchase of one of these "combinations" is really a gamble with enormously long odds against the punter. These reasons should be sufficient to show the most foolish of the public the unwisdom of dealing with the firm; but another may be mentioned. The International Securities Syndicate is no doubt a somewhat impressive title in the eyes of innocents; but who are the persons using it? What guarantee is there of their respectability, their financial stability, their trustworthiness as recipients of the money of the public paying for bonds by instalments?

More to Follow?

By one neat stroke the Recorder of London last week made a clean sweep of the Globe and Lancashire Stock Exchange, Blythe, Gould and Co., Gordon, Richmond and Co., and Fife, Hamilton and Co. These were the various well-sounding titles under which Edward Wm. Donallon, alias E. Pellett (now gone to gaol for twenty months' hard labour), and John Hollingworth (twelve months' ditto) had for a couple of years carried on a series of bucket-shop frauds. The promise of a profit of £50 a month on an "investment" of £5 was the bait they held out, and victims were hooked among all classes of the community. A major in the Indian Army parted with £35; a London clergyman with £20. It has been said that where a demand is there will be a supply, and when presumably educated men, to say nothing of a host of ignorant people, can be so easily imposed upon, it is not perhaps surprising that frauds of this sort are common. It is, however, part of the business of the law to protect the fools from the rogues, and I hope that this prosecution of Donallon and Hollingworth will be promptly followed up by others. There are still at large in the city a considerable number of swindlers practising precisely the same game.

A South African Stores Scandal.

Recently a shareholder in the Naval, Military, and Civil Service Co-operative Stores of South Africa, Limited, suggested to me that the whole history of that unfortunate concern ought to be unfolded for the benefit of the public. I am inclined to think so myself, but the difficulty is that the story embraces a series of scandals too numerous and too complicated to be related in any detail in the space at my disposal. Besides, many of the facts have already been published, though only in detached instalments. It is, for instance, now known to everybody interested that the promoter of the company, which was registered in April, 1902, was Marcus Percy Shorrock, who at that time was an undischarged bankrupt, and who, for the purpose of this promotion, used a concern called Services, Limited, of which he was the sole director. Eventually Shorrock also got himself appointed a "committee of one" to exercise all the powers of the board of directors of the Co-operative Stores Company. The original directors, mainly military men, seem to have been mere instruments in the hands of Shorrock. One of their first proceedings was to enter into a monstrously inequitable contract with Services, Limited, and apart from this the conduct of the company's business was marked by the most reprehensible laxity and incompetence. Shares were allotted to the public to the amount of about £42,000, and a further £6,322 was obtained by an issue of debentures. By the end of the first year upwards of £17,000 had been spent for which there was nothing whatever to show, and in April, 1903, a compulsory winding-up order was made upon a shareholder's petition. This order was unfortunately discharged a couple of months later, and thenceforward the position of the company went from bad to worse. Its absolute helplessness was at length admitted, and in September last it was resolved that the company should be wound up. Mr. F. B. Smart, of 22, Queen-street, E.C., being appointed liquidator. The liquidation is not yet completed, but it is quite clear that the shareholders have not the remotest chance of receiving back a penny of their money. As to the debenture holders, an action was brought against the company for the return of the money subscribed. This action was settled in October, 1905, on an undertaking on the part of the company as to the transfer of certain property in South Africa, for which purpose a sum of £5,997 was left in the hands of the trustees for the debenture holders. The undertaking as to the property in South Africa was not carried out, but soon after it had been given the trustees advanced £4,800 of the money to the Higgs Dairy Company (then known as the Army and Navy Dairy Company), which is another of Shorrock's companies. This advance was made at the time without any security, though subsequently debenture stock certificates for £3,300 and a deposit note for £1,500 were taken from the Higgs Dairy Company. Besides Shorrock, two other directors of the Co-operative Stores were also directors of the Dairy Company, and one of the two trustees for the debenture holders in the former company was also a director of the latter. This transaction was severely condemned by Mr. Justice Neville a few weeks ago on a further application by the debenture holders against the South African Company and the trustees, but his lordship found that no actual breach of the undertaking had been proved to have been committed, inasmuch as no specific time for its performance was fixed. From beginning to end the story of the Naval, Military, and Civil Service Co-operative Stores of South Africa is a gross scandal, and it is to be regretted that the law is apparently impotent to deal with it.

Insurance Notes—Prudential—Sun Life—American Life Offices.

As a rule, I say little or nothing about the annual reports of insurance companies, because for the most part it is more interesting and more useful to the general reader to deal with practical insurance matters from the point of view of the policy-holder. Here and there, however, among the numerous accounts which are being published at the present time there are some which, for one reason or another, are of exceptional interest. The Prudential Assurance Company, for instance, with nearly 18,000,000 policies in force, is an institution of interest to almost everybody. The magnitude of the Prudential is a standing marvel, but is by no means the most wonderful thing about it. The point that strikes me most is the perfection and organisation of the management in every detail. Organisation is the keynote of the Prudential position. Its work is limited to the British Isles, and so thoroughly does it cover the whole field that its funds approximate in amount to those of the great American life offices, which do business throughout the civilised world. Its total assets amount to close upon £64,000,000, and every year it has to find fresh investments for something like £5,000,000. The low prices for good securities which have been prevailing in recent years are a great benefit to a company like the Prudential, which has no occasion to realise its assets. The plan adopted is to enter securities in the balance-sheet at their cost price, and not to write them up or down to the market value from year to year. Even in present circumstances the reserve fund for fluctuation in the value of securities considerably exceeds the difference between the market and the book value of the securities. The financial position of the company is superabundantly strong, and its financial strength is being steadily increased from year to year.

Both last year and this the directors had a pleasant surprise to announce to their policy-holders. In 1906 an enormous amount was set aside for the purpose of giving bonuses to industrial policy-holders; these were not provided for in the policies, and the concession was an act of wise generosity on the part of the shareholders which has been fully appreciated, as is shown by the great extension of the industrial branch. This policy of granting extended benefits to industrial policy-holders is to be continued, although the total cost of the benefits already exceeds £4,000,000. On the present occasion it is the turn of the ordinary policy-holders. For the last ten years participating policies have had the sum assured increased by a bonus addition of 30s. a year on each £100. The directors now see their way to increase this bonus to 32s., and to maintain it at this higher rate for the future. When we remember that the average amount of an ordinary policy in the Prudential is less than £100, it will be recognised that the Prudential affords small policy-holders the opportunity of assuring to particularly good advantage. The magnitude of the Prudential business is the obvious thing to say about it, but the much more important point is the merit, as judged by the results to policy-holders, and the soundness and ability with which its affairs are managed.

With the end of 1906 the Sun Life Office completed a quinquennial valuation period, and with commendable promptness the results are already published, including specimens of the bonuses. The bonuses to policyholders are the final test of success, and in this respect the latest valuation of the Sun is a slight improvement upon that of 1901, and a great deal better than 1896. The society has funds sufficient to meet its liabilities if interest is earned at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, any interest in excess of that rate constituting an additional source of both security and future profit. As the rate earned last year was £4 4s. 9d., after deduction of income-tax, it will be seen that the profit from this source is considerable. The Sun Life has proved in very practical fashion that it is feasible to issue life policies without medical examination. When the Sun started this it was regarded as a bold experiment, but the favourable mortality mentioned in the report fully justifies the action of the directors, which has been very popular with the public. The further innovation of accepting premiums monthly has proved a great convenience to a large number of people. I do not mean that the Sun was the first to adopt this course, but I think it has been the only one to do a monthly premium business on a large scale at a moderate rate of expense.

The disturbances in the American life offices make their accounts for last year of quite unusual interest. I should doubt if so great an improvement as is revealed by the reports of these companies has ever before taken place in so short a time. The New York Life reduced the rate of expenditure from 22 per cent. of the premium income to 17 per cent.; and although part of this saving may be due to a reduction in the amount of the new business, it undoubtedly gives proof of real economies effected and promise of further economies to come. I have for years been objecting to the American life offices for three reasons. Their chief aim was bigness, their principle of working was the tontine bonus system, and the consequence of these two things was a very extravagant rate of expenditure. On all three of these points the practices of the companies have been altered. The amount of the new business they are now allowed to do in the course of a year must not exceed assurances for £30,000,000, although even last year, in spite of a great deal of dissatisfaction, the New York Life issued new policies assuring £34,508,639. This limitation of new business directly conduces to economy and to the welfare of policyholders. The tontine bonus system, whereby the profits were alloted only to those who survived the tontine period, usually of twenty years, is also abolished in favour of annual bonuses. For a variety of reasons this is a great improvement. It enables the position of the companies from year to year to be judged much more effectively than before, and it is a distinct check upon extravagant management. The investments of the American life offices have always been managed very skilfully. The New York Life, for instance, is able to announce that not one penny of interest was in default at the close of the year, and the Mutual of New York were in a position to make a similar statement.

The Mutual also shows a reduction in expenses of more than 7 per cent. of the premium income, while the bonuses declared in 1907 exceed by more than 20 per cent. the bonuses of 1906. Considered as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, these economies and reforms altogether outweigh the irregularities about which so much fuss was made. The companies themselves have practically condemned their former custom of paying £20,000 or £30,000 a year to their presidents, who now receive only £10,000. It has quite properly been declared illegal to contribute to political party funds, or to attempt to ward off legislation in various States by bribing legislators, who frequently introduced their Bills for the purpose of earning blackmail; but the plain fact of the matter is that the cost of these practices to the policy-holders was infinitesimal, while the abolition of tontine bonuses, the limitation of new business, and the big reduction in expenses, are points of very great importance which must inevitably produce vastly better results than before for the policy-holders. In regard to the American offices, people have been straining at gnats and swallowing camels in the most absurd fashion. Personally, I strained at the camels, and quite consciously swallowed the gnats. Now that both the camels and the gnats have been got rid of, it is only fair to point out that the serious objections which I formerly expressed to the three New York companies have entirely ceased to exist, and that I look forward with confidence to their future being characterised by great prosperity.

Last week, by a clerical error, I said the exact opposite of what I meant about sundry house-purchase insurance companies, though I hope the context made my meaning clear. I should have said, "They commonly promise a vast deal more than it is possible to accomplish, and perform a vast deal less than it is perfectly feasible for a first-class life office to do." Unfortunately this word "less" was printed as "more."

New Issues.

The following new issues are announced:—

De Dion-Bouton (1907), Limited.—With a capital of £195,000, divided into 185,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 200,000 deferred shares of 1s. each, this company has been formed to acquire the business, contracts, rights, and property of a company of the same name (registered in England in 1899), which has the exclusive selling agency in the United Kingdom and the British Colonies of cars manufactured by the celebrated French firm, De Dion-Bouton et Cie. The new company also acquires various De Dion-Bouton patents and licences in respect thereof, now held by other companies, which will give it the control in the United Kingdom and the Colonies of the whole manufacture and sale of motor vehicles manufactured under the above-mentioned patents. Unexecuted orders for motors amounting to £59,000 are being taken over by the company. The profits of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, are shown to have risen from £800 in 1900 to £20,163 in 1906. It is estimated that on an annual output of 1,500 cars being attained a net manufacturing profit of £78,500 should be made. Subscriptions are invited for the ordinary shares, and the list will close on or before Thursday, March 14.

Hitherto the business has been restricted to the sale of imported "De Dion" cars, the company having no manufacturing rights. From the first the profits have steadily increased, and with the further development of the business that is now projected, the shares offered appear to be a fairly promising speculative investment. The presence of Mr. S. F. Edge and Mr. J. W. Stocks at the head of the new undertaking should ensure its being ably managed.

Buenos Ayres Midland Railway Co.—Applications are invited for the purchase of £600,000 Five per Cent. First Debentures, at £92 10s. per cent. of this company, the amount forming part of a total authorised sum of £2,000,000. The company is registered under English law, and has been authorised under a concession granted by the Provincial Government of Buenos Ayres to construct and work a metre gauge line of about 333 miles in length, between Barracas al Sud (a suburb of the city of Buenos Ayres) and Adolfo Alsina (Carhué), the junction of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern and Buenos Ayres Western Railways. The concession includes, among other provisions and regulations, the free introduction of the necessary material for the construction and working of the line; the exemption from all municipal and provincial taxes until the line shall have earned 8 per cent. on the capital invested in the construction of the railway, and the reservation by the Provincial Government to expropriate the railway twenty years after it has been open to traffic, the value of such expropriation to be fixed by arbitration plus an additional 20 per cent. The district through which the new line will pass is reported upon by Mr. Charles Steel, late General Manager of the Great Northern Railway (of England), and Mr. Oliver Budge, formerly General Manager of the East Argentine Railway, and now one of the directors of the new concern. These gentlemen state that the railway will traverse some of the most productive districts of the Argentine Republic, and pass through districts similar to those served by the Buenos Ayres Western lines. Construction work was commenced in June last, and it is anticipated that the first 25 kilometres of the line from Barracas al Sud will be completed very shortly. The list of applications for the debentures will close to-day (Wednesday)

In view of the great scope for development there is in Argentina and of the very successful careers of the lines serving the southern half of the Republic, there is no reason to take aught but a cheerful view of the new company's prospects. At the same time, seeing that the line has yet to be built, nobody can pretend to definite knowledge of what the company's earning power will turn out to be. Under these circumstances the new scrip is a somewhat speculative investment, especially when regarded from the point of view of a debenture.

The Arnoya Mining Company, Ltd.—This company has a capital of £400,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £4 each, of which 95,000 are offered for public subscription. It has been formed (inter alia) to acquire by lease, concession, licence, or otherwise, mines, mining rights, or metalliferous lands in any part of the world or any interest therein, and to explore, exercise, develop, and turn to account the same; and particularly in the first instance to acquire two tin mines known as "Sultana" and "Sultana II.," both situated in the neighbourhood of the towns of Ribadavia and Filgueiras, and near to the village of Paolo, in the province of Orense, Spain. It is stated that a considerable amount of work has been carried out on the principal tin lodes on the property, and some of the levels have been sunk to the extent of 200 mètres or thereabouts. The engineer reports that a present production of 1,200 tons of oxide of tin may be obtained from the property, and this should produce about 890 tons of metal, at an estimated working cost of £33,000. At present the market price of tin varies from £190 to £195 per ton. The subscription list closes on Thursday for town, and on Friday for the country.

Canadian Estates, Limited.—The capital of this company is £400,000, divided into 215,000 seven per cent. participating preference shares of £1 each and 185,000 ordinary shares. Subscriptions are invited for the preference shares. The company has been formed primarily to acquire the whole of the share capital of the Douglas Lake Cattle Company, Ltd., a company incorporated according to the laws of British Columbia, and owning the Douglas Lake Ranch, described by the prospectus as the best known and most valuable of the cattle and horse ranches in that country. This company has been composed of three shareholders, only, whose advanced age is the sole reason for their parting with their interests.

It is mentioned that, owing to the manner in which the books of the Douglas Lake Company have been kept, it is impossible to give a proper balance-sheet, and only estimates of profits from the ranch are available. The present offer of participating preference shares (the preferential dividend is non-cumulative) does not seem to be very attractive.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities.

Colonel.—1. They are excellently secured, and will pro touch par later on, when monetary conditions improve

Although not having any special revenue hypothecated to them as in the case of No. 1, these bonds ought to be worth keeping. The fall has been due almost entirely to dear money, which necessitated the raising of a new loan upon a 5 per cent. basis. Naturally, under such circumstances, the yield on the Fours had to be readjusted for the time being. High Walter.—The municipality has defaulted before, and I should not like to say it will never do so again. However, the yield is fairly high.

Railways.

Anceps.—A high-class investment. You could buy or sell through the London Stock Exchange, though, of course, the market for the shares is a somewhat nominal one. D. W. W.—I would not care to recommend any for investment at present. Ablitt.—Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference and Buenos Ayres Western New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference. Orient.—The bonds offered a few weeks ago are quoted 1 discount to 1 premium—that is cum the rights to $300 Preferred and $300 Common for every $1,000 bond. There are no dealings in the issue placed last year, and I have therefore been unable to obtain a price. The Common stock is quoted at 15 and the Preferred at 35. The Shanghai-Nanking Railway profit-sharing sub. certificates are worth about 7½. They are, of course, a very speculative holding, and hardly fit for a lady. E. H. F.—1. I do not look for any immediate recovery, and would not average at present. 2. For lock-up purposes an exchange into the Third Preference would be advisable. F. C. C.—It would be a mistake to sell such a sound stock at a loss. All investment securities are depressed for the time being. P. Arson.—1. The shares bore a guarantee, and are therefore an excellent investment. 2. The recent history of the line has been a sore disappointment. You might await the report, but unless that document puts a much better complexion upon the dividend than was given by the formal dividend announcement, it would be advisable to cut the loss. Strandtown.—You could get practically 4½ per cent. with excellent security on Buenos Ayres Western Railway New Preference shares. I would not advise you to try for more. Juvenis.—1. No. 2. Apply to the secretary. Perplexed.—The conversion plan had a good deal to recommend it, and you need have no doubt about the bona-fides of the people carrying it through. Your new scrip will be delivered in due course. Riddle.—I have made inquiries, and find that the value of the new 4 per cent. bonds is not 80, as you state, but about 70. Tottenham.—Both high-class investments, and should be held for an ultimate recovery. Poor Man.—You are asking too high a yield to be compatible with safety. No. 1 is a hopeful speculative purchase, but I do not see where you get your yield of £5 6s. 8d. from. The stock last year got 3 per cent. It may, and probably will, get 4 per cent. in respect of the current year, but you cannot regard this as a matter of course. Nos. 2 and 5 are too speculative, and both 3 and 6 are unsuitable, because of the options held by the companies to redeem at any time. No. 4 would be a good purchase, though for the present the margin behind the stock is very small; indeed, it has not yet been proved that the stock earned its full interest in the second half of last year, though in all probability it did. Como.—Hold. See this week's comments. F. J.—There is no reason why you should sell at a loss. The line is doing very well, and there is reason to look for a moderate advance before long.

Mines.

Primrose.—There is a fair chance of the shares having some recovery, in which event it might be as well to realise. Bell.—Hold for the directors' report. See my notes this week. R. R. R.—An exchange into the tin shares would be a hopeful speculation, as you would then receive good interest on your money. J. K. S.—Dividend prospects are rather remote, and by waiting you might be able to purchase still cheaper. Wee McGregor.—It is impossible to estimate the lives of such propositions as you name, but on the information available the shares appear hopeful speculative holdings. Long.—1. The present does not seem a favourable time to realise. 2. Prospects are not very bright. 3. The concern has gone into liquidation. Domus.—1. South Broken Hills are the best as a holding, but you should not put too much money into the shares of a group such as this, which is so largely dependent upon the course of the metal market. 2. Ivanhoes are good holding for dividends.

Mixed Securities.

Jungle.—1. The rate varies according to the movement in the Bank Rate. 2 and 3. The bank is thoroughly sound, but you could probably do better by investing the money in securities. I would suggest spreading the proceeds over Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, Argentine Great Western Five per Cent. New Debentures, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series), and National Railroad of Mexico Prior Lien bonds. The return would be just over 4½ per cent. Farway.—If you wished to transfer the money to securities you could obtain fully 4½ per cent. with little risk by spreading the proceeds, as per my advice to "Jungle." C. C. C.—Nos. 1 and 4 are promising holdings, and there is a fair chance of No. 3 having some improvement eventually. No. 2 is doing fairly well now, but I do not look for early dividends. Orkney.—1. You may as well hold for a better market. The life is estimated at about ten years. 2. Good for a regular dividend. 3. A fair speculation, but they may not have much advance in the early future. You must not overlook the fact that since the price mentioned was touched the capital has been increased. Alpha.—1. Grand Trunk Pacific New Four per Cent. Debentures, Central London Railway Four per Cent Preferred, London, Brighton, and South Coast Preferred Ordinary, Buenos Ayres Western Railway new Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, National Railroad of Mexico Prior Lien Debentures, San Paulo Railway Five and a Half per Cent. Permanent Debentures, Lyons Preference, and Imperial Tobacco Preferred Ordinary. Spread your money over the lot. 2. Hold. 3. You might exchange into a Kaffir, such as Robinson Deep, as then you would receive interest on your money. Binks.—1. The stock is a sound investment. 2. The company's chief traffic is derived from minerals, the line serving a rich silver mining district. It is also largely interested in the carriage of nitrate. 3. Not more likely in the company's district than any other part of South America. 4. A hopeful speculative holding. Which.—1. The margin behind the stocks is now none too large, though it is difficult to imagine the Preferred issues actually going short. 2. Narrowness of market is the great drawback with these stocks. If you do not mind this, I see no objections to a purchase. Redemption is to be at par. Dix.—1. The life is estimated at about ten years, and the shares appear a good holding for dividends. 2. I have a poor opinion of these. 3. From the investment point of view the Minas bonds would be preferable. B. P.—1. I cannot enter into a dividend calculation here, but may say the stock is a likely purchase at present price. 2. It is not unlikely you will. Newbridge.—1. They might be held for the time being. 2. Buenos Ayres Western Railway New Four and a Half per Cent Preference shares. John.—There is little attraction in running any of them on the terms you mention. Ladies' Agency.—The stocks are highly speculative, and I should not care to recommend. Reader, Amsterdam.—1-4. You could make a more attractive selection at present than either of these. 5. I consider "bears" of either too risky to recommend. Sniqpol.—1 and 2. These are not semi-private, as you imagine, and you could get copies of the last reports upon application. 3. These bonds are good enough; 4 and 5 could be improved upon; but 6 may recover still further in the near future. Noumena.—1. I cannot trace the concern. 2. A further slight improvement in profits is not improbable, but I would not advise you to average. 3. I cannot trace the first concern, and I do not fancy the dairy shares. 4. Whether they will touch that figure this year is problematical. Why not try a foreign government stock? Watchful.—The Bank shares ought to be held, and also No. 3. Have you named the Nitrate share correctly? As to your last question, I do not recommend brokers. See rule. Holloway.—Such a transfer would be all right. The shares named make a decent selection. Persia.—These are only dealt in locally, and it is difficult to obtain an approximate price. Suffered like the rest of the trade, and the threatened legislation does not improve the outlook. H., Truro.—As a whole, they are worth holding on to. C. H.—Schweppes Deferred would make a fair speculative purchase, but the others are altogether unattractive. Seaside.—The chances of the shares reaching such a figure again are remote. The existing quotation is, nominally, anything under 2s. 6d. Robinson Deep. Patsey.—Would not advise the exchange at present. The colliery shares are dear, even at 1s. 9d. each. I have no reason for anticipating a rise in the others. Ardent.—1. I should be inclined to secure the present price for the shares held. Mount Morgans are a hopeful purchase with a view to ultimate dividends of fully 10 per cent. on the current price, and Arizonas are also a good selection. 2 and 4. The fall in the price of the shares from the level at which you originally purchased is accounted for by the falling off in dividends. Recent developments in the mine have shown improvement, and I think you might hold. 3. The shares are a fair speculative holding, but it is doubtful whether they will have a material advance in value in the early future. 5. Have no recent information. 6. There is a very fair chance of 160 being reached in time, though if you can secure a profit of, say, 10 points you might perhaps consider the advisability of doing so. Do not forget that the man who always waits for the top is the man who usually gets out at the bottom. Norfolk.—1. Prospects are very speculative, and unless you are prepared to face the possibility of a further decline in the shares you had better realise. 2. Trunk Thirds would be a good purchase at the present price.

Insurance.

Kent Inquirer.—Its methods are not satisfactory; read my insurance notes last week. B. M. O.—You could do better elsewhere. The objection is to the one-sided nature of some of the conditions on which the bonds are issued. Oxo.—I advise you to have nothing to do with the Corporation you mention. Eton.—1. The company is quite sound and reliable. 2. This is a mere sum in arithmetic, dependent on wages paid. 3. Insist on a policy covering all casual employees; the extra cost is very slight. R. V.—Leave it alone. See my last week's article. Doubtful.—I looked carefully into the condition of this society some time ago, and have reason to believe it is quite sound and good. J. H. J.—I do not like the look of the prospectus. I should want to be satisfied with the accounts and valuation report before recommending it.

Miscellaneous.

Lighthouse, Congo, The Sop, Eleo, Bond, S. H. P., G. W. F., Petty Cash, F. J., Bristol, Yum-Tum-Yum.—I do not give advice with regard to the relative merits of different foreign premium or lottery bonds. On the contrary, I recommend you not to engage in this form of speculation. In any case, you should carefully avoid all the touting firms, including the bucket-shop called the International Securities Syndicate, to which I am referring in another column. For the information of those correspondents who still wish to purchase such bonds, however, I may mention that the business can be safely done through Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C., or the Crédit Lyonnais. Dale.—1-3. Read preceding answer. 4. A concern that has been adversely criticised in Truth. R. H. G., Bromley.—Have nothing to do with the Arnold and Butler bucket-shop. Rex.—I am unacquainted with the firm, and so I cannot advise you. Constant Reader.—The National Share Exchange is another bucket-shop. Nola.—I have never heard anything against it, but I cannot make any recommendation; see rule 8. A Small Investor and G. H. H.—I cannot, of course, answer for its safety, but I have had no reason for unfavourable criticism. J. W. E.—Thanks for the circular from the notorious John B. McKenzie. Captain J. D. B.—I had already seen the issue of the Daily Mail, which, on the same page, contained a half column advertisement by a bucket-shop and a warning against the firm in question by the City Editor. Vestor.—Probably you know by this time that you can, if you choose, withdraw; you had better do so. Erie.—1. I do not make such recommendations. 2-5. Read statement above as to premium bonds. Puzzled.—Thanks for your reminder of the position, which I had for the time being overlooked. Sub.—It has not yet been actually carried out. Chin Chin.—Seeing that the company's capital is to be materially reduced it would be unwise to purchase the shares. It will be some time before the concern fully recovers from the disastrous experiments of a few years ago. They are unattractive at present. Spero.—I know nothing about the agency. I have not a high opinion of the deep lead shares. Infelix.—1. The company is safe if things go well, but it is not one of the best. 2. I am not familiar with the issue. Presumably you refer to the new preference shares, which stand at about ½ premium. Britannicus.—You will observe that I am dealing with the syndicate this week.

Slump in Hudson's Bays—Allsopp Amalgamation Dropped—Electric Light Companies—'Buses and Trams—British Electric Traction—Mazawattee Tea.

In the Miscellaneous Market one of the outstanding incidents has been the sharp drop in Hudson's Bays, which on the week are 6 points lower. No doubt the slump was partly attributable to sympathy with the depression in other Canadian securities, but the chief factor was the heavy selling from the north in connection with the closing of an account; and at one time the shares fell as much as 9 points below the high-water mark of the previous week. Additional emphasis has certainly been given to my frequently reiterated opinion that "Bays" are a gamble which should be left to rich men, and the movements of the past few days make a decidedly amusing commentary—amusing, that is, to all but the foolish victims—on the fact that one of the bucket-shop brigade has actually been bamboozling people into purchasing these shares on a 1 per cent. marginal basis. Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred have exhibited rather more steadiness than might have been anticipated in view of the wild fluctuations elsewhere, and only a slight reduction was recorded. In the brewery department a surprise was furnished by the announcement of the abandonment of the proposed amalgamation of Allsopps with Thomas Salt and Co. and the Burton Brewery Company. It was supposed that the scheme was practically completed except for some purely formal steps. However, the announcement has been received with a feeling of relief by the holders of the Allsopp Four per Cent. Debentures, whose position would have been prejudiced by the ranking of a sum of £300,000 in priority to their security. The dropping of the arrangement has given the debentures a rise of 3 points, and, apart from this particular consideration, in view of the fresh legislation which is expected it is perhaps just as well for Allsopps that the company is not to take over nearly 500 more additional licensed houses. As a whole, brewery securities continue on the downward grade, though the movement is now very slight.

There was some improvement in electric supply companies' shares on the victory of the "Municipal Reformers" at the L.C.C. election, but it did not last, the week closing with only small gains in the shares of the City of London and one or two other companies, whilst some others showed a reduction. Though the election removes the menace of the L.C.C. bulk supply scheme, it does not, as I have previously pointed out, do away with the danger that the present companies may be hit by another scheme which will scarcely be rendered less injurious by reason of the fact that it is a private and not a municipal enterprise. Judging from various statements that have been published, the change in the political complexion of the L.C.C. has produced some extraordinary illusions. There are people who seem to imagine that sweeping alterations will be made in the municipal tramway service with an eye to the advantage of 'bus companies, though there is really not the least likelihood that anything of the kind will be done. In the Bankruptcy Court last week the failure of a small 'bus company was attributed to the competition of the London United Tramways Company. It would be deemed the height of absurdity to ask this company to cripple its service for the sake of a rival concern, and there is no probability that such a request will be more successful when addressed to a municipal body. On the other hand, there is plenty of room for the 'buses in districts where the trams have not appeared and are not likely to do so. The principal difficulty is that for the time being the old companies and the new are engaged in a system of cut-throat competition. At the best such companies as the London General and the London Road Car must have suffered pretty severely during the necessarily costly period of transition from horse to motor traction. Both, however, have also had to encounter the keen opposition of the new motor-'bus concerns, and in the stress of competition fares on a number of routes have been brought down to a level which leaves no margin of profit. Some rather pessimistic remarks were made by the deputy chairman at the meeting of the London General Omnibus Company. He declared that the motor-'bus as a commercial success had not yet appeared either with his own or any other company, and he predicted that "they were going to have bad times, not only now, but for two or three half-years." This pessimistic utterance had a natural sequel in another drop in the company's ordinary stock, which now stands at 62½. Still, with good management both the London General and the Road Car companies will be far better able to weather the storm than the majority of the motor-'bus companies. British Electric Traction issues have at last shown a welcome tendency to improve, though it must be confessed that the traffic receipts are still far from satisfactory. For the third year in succession the ordinary shareholders of the Mazawattee Tea Company receive no dividend, but the report for 1906 indicates some improvement in the position. The present board are evidently making a vigorous effort to repair the disastrous blunder their predecessors perpetrated in opening a large number of retail shops. Nearly all the shops have now been disposed of, and it is estimated that the total loss through this rash enterprise will be about £220,000. This will probably be met by cutting down the nominal value of the shares, a course to which the shareholders may submit with less despondency, since under the policy now being pursued the profits of the company are showing a satisfactory recovery. Waring and Gillow shares have manifested a slightly better tendency during the week. In the motor and cycle section the only noteworthy feature has been the demand for Darracqs.

QUEER STORY.

HOW McTAVISH GOT HIS "BLUE."

"We've nine men up at Oxford now
Of whom it doth appear
That eight of them they cannot row,
The ninth he cannot steer."

THUS sang Tommy English, captain of the Dark Blue Rugger XV., at an informal wine given by his friend, Teddy Basingstoke, of The House. The words quoted were, of course, no original composition of the singer's, being (as every Oxford man knows) a facetious and chaffing formula which, with slight variations, has been in use at the senior University from time immemorial—being usually applied to college boats that have cut an inglorious figure in Eights week. But, on this particular occasion, the chaff was directed at the 'Varsity Eight itself.

Hilary term was then rather more than a fortnight old; and Dudley-Carter, President of the O.U.B.C., had, with infinite difficulty, and after many choppings and changings, got together something in the shape of a representative crew. His difficulties had been greater than usual, inasmuch as with the exception of himself and of Jim Cuthbertson, last year's stroke, he had no old choices to fall back upon. The other six places had to be filled with new and comparatively unknown material. But the thing had at last been done and an eight formed. It was really not such a bad eight, though just at present somewhat backward and raw. A few shrewd judges, looking, not at the immediate form, but rather at the future possibilities, saw the making of quite an average boat. But the hoi polloi, seeing only what was, and not what was presently to be, generally voted the crew a rotter, and chaffed it, with good-natured derision, accordingly. Hence the application of the song, of which a verse has been quoted above.

Especial point was lent to this chaff by the presence of Cuthbertson, the stroke—a "House" man, who lived on the same staircase as Teddy Basingstoke, and had looked in for awhile upon the convivial scene. Cuthbertson, of course, was in training, and therefore unable to partake of the flowing bowl and the nicotian weed personally; but there was nothing to prevent his joining in the conversation and seeking a brief respite from the solid stodginess of Aristotle in the more congenial frivolity of his fellow undergraduates.

In point of fact, however, although a Grant's "Ethics" and a Peter's translation of the same had been lying open before him and apparently occupying his attention, it was not the stodginess of the Stagirite from which he really sought relief, but something else very much more troublesome—to wit, gloomy personal reflections arising (as they say in the Services) out of "urgent private affairs." That formula, indeed, may mean anything, or it may mean nothing. More generally—especially when pleaded by an officer as a pretext for leave—it means nothing. But, in the case of Jim Cuthbertson, it meant a good deal. It was (to be precise) a pecuniary urgency that oppressed him. He was deeply in debt. He had aggravated his indebtedness by having recourse to moneylenders. And his financial position was now acute.

The worst of it was, too, that he dared not go to his people. His father was by no means well-off; moreover, the old gentleman had a horror of debt, which he regarded as an unpardonable sin. What the effect of a request for £500 would be upon him young Cuthbertson shuddered to think. Yet it needed every penny of £500 to relieve him from his embarrassments. It was the devil of a situation, and was preying more and more upon the young man's mind; though, as far as he could, he tried to shut his eyes to it.

However, of this digression enough. Let us return to Ted Basingstoke's "wine," and the singing of that song by Tommy English at the expense of the Dark Blue eight. Cuthbertson, the only member of the crew present, was too good a fellow to take mere friendly chaff in bad part; but he was rather in the mood, just then, for a "rag" to help work off his worries, and he seized upon English's song as a favourable opening. He went for the football giant, forcibly, though quite good-humouredly, and a sort of friendly Hackenschmidt-Madrali wrestling bout ensued between the two. Both were as muscular as they make 'em, and in the pink of condition; and they grappled with each other long and vigorously, amid the furious plaudits of the assembled company. An unfortunate accident, however, brought the rag to a premature termination. Cuthbertson's arm went through the window, cutting his right hand rather badly—so badly, indeed, that he found it advisable to run out to a neighbouring chemist's and have it properly bandaged. The chemist advised him to hang up his hand in a sling at once, with the added comforting assurance that it was likely to be some time before he would be able to use it again. Here was a pretty thing to have happened to the stroke of the 'Varsity Eight within five weeks of the boat race!

Dudley-Carter was nearly mad about it. He walked into the unfortunate Cuthbertson with that directness of phraseology which is characteristic of rowing autocrats. He called him a something ass, a something else fool, and a liberally adjectived juggins. He said that if the accident had happened in a reasonable way, he shouldn't have had so much to say about it. But for Cuthbertson to go and lay himself out in a miserable little rag at a potty "wine" was really too provoking. A man on whom so much depended should have had more sense than to incur risks in this kind of silly bear-fighting. Where was he (the President) to find another stroke? There wasn't another, worth twopence, in the whole 'Varsity. And Cuthbertson knew it. He deserved to be kicked to—somewhere unmentionable—for his idiocy in having crippled himself at this juncture.

Such in substance, though very much bowdlerised in phraseology, was the pith of Dudley-Carter's remarks. It may have relieved the speaker's feelings. Let us hope it did. But, of course, not all the adjectives and past participles in the language could put use into Cuthbertson's crippled hand. When all was said, he still remained hors de combat. And where was an adequate substitute to be found?

The unfortunate stroke took his ragging meekly and in subjection, as rowing men all learn to do from their aquatic pastors and masters, by whom they have long grown accustomed to be damned into shape. He merely said, with apologetic humility, that he was awfully sorry, don't you know, and that it would be a jolly good lesson to him not to play the giddy goat at a "wine" again. While as for not being able to find a substitute, it could hardly be that he was the only decent stroke in the whole bally 'Varsity, don't you know; there must be some other johnny who——

"D—n it then, give him a name," interposed the President, irritably. "If you can, you are a jolly sight better informed than I am. That's all I have to say."

"Well, there's Jeffers, of Magdalen," suggested Cuthbertson.

"Pish! All very well over a short distance. From Iffley to the Barges is just his limit. He'd crack up about Harrod's and faint away before Barnes Bridge. Try another."

"Why not Menifield, of Corpus, then?"

"Tut!—Menifield! What's the good of a feather-weight like him, with a crowd averaging twelve-seven behind him?"

"How about Cornbury, of New?"

"Cornbury!" (and the President's tone expressed immeasurable scorn). "The maximum of style with the minimum of work. Always reminds me of those flash cobs that put everything into the action of their forelegs. The Corner looks a picture I grant you; but he doesn't put enough back into his work to pull a sprat off a gridiron."

Cuthbertson scratched his head in thoughtful perplexity.

"Well, really, I don't know that I have any one else to suggest, at the moment," he said; "unless it's that dark horse of a fresher who's just come up to Univ——"

"Eh! Who's he? Never heard of him," interposed the President, contemptuously.

"Oh! he's a johnny named—d—n it, I forget his name. Anyway, at the present moment, he's stroking the Univ. togger, and they talk of him there as something phenomenal."

"The Univ. togger! Oh, my aunt!" ejaculated the President, holding up his hands in derisive mockery. "We may be in a bad way; no doubt we are. But we haven't yet sunk quite so low as to look for the 'Varsity stroke in a College togger."

"Don't sound very promising, I admit. But, after all, every fresher has to begin that way. The fellow's in the togger, I suppose, because at this time of day there's nothing better for him to be in. But Horncastle—you know Horncastle——"

"Rather! He was in my house at Eton."

"I was dining with him at Univ. last Sunday, and he was simply full of this what's-his-name. Says he's one of those raræ aves, a born stroke, and that they haven't had such a find at the College for years and years. I believe Horncastle's something of a judge, too."

"Not bad," admitted Dudley-Carter, condescendingly. "Rather too much inclined, perhaps, to regard all his own geese as swans. But, still, not bad. By the way, where does this marvellous fresher phenomenon hail from? He's not an Eton man, I'll be bound; or I must have heard of him."

"Eton! Good Lord, no!" laughed Cuthbertson. "He comes, I think Horncastle said, from some North Country grammar school, and learnt his rowing on the Tyne, or the Tees, or the Wear; I forget which. That's all I can tell you about him. I've never seen him in a boat. But Horncastle pointed him out to me in hall. He's a great, gaunt, rawboned chap, with a good chest and any amount of sinew—to look at him. But, as I say, I know nothing about him as an oar first-hand. You had better ask Horncastle."

"Umph! Well, I can do no harm by asking," replied the President; "and not much good, I'm afraid, either. These North Country oarsmen seldom do turn out much use for our work. Different style altogether. However, perhaps I'll see Horncastle about him, on the off-chance."

"Better see the chap row, for yourself, first—I should suggest," answered Cuthbertson. "You'll be able to tell at a glance, then, whether he's any great shakes or not. For my part, I'm inclined to agree with you that these North Country oars aren't, as a rule, much use on the Thames. The Univ. togger is sure to be out this afternoon. You might take quiet stock of him, then."

"Ah! perhaps I will," replied the President.

He strolled out on the tow-path that afternoon and took up his position by the Gut, where he could command the longest and best sight of passing boats. Presently, the Univ. togger came along, stroked by a gaunt, sinewy, red-headed individual, whose personal aspect made it evident to the most casual eye that he hailed from one of the counties adjacent to the Scottish border. But Dudley-Carter hardly noticed the fellow's personal aspect. His attention was entirely occupied in gauging his oarsmanship. The President's face brightened, and his eyes sparkled, as he looked.

"By Gad!" he muttered to himself, as he watched the togger out of sight round the bend; "Horncastle was right, after all. The chap's a peach!"

That evening the captain of the Univ. Boat Club received a request from Dudley-Carter, President of the O.U.B.C., that McTavish, stroke of the college torpid, might be let off to attend at the 'Varsity Barge at 2 p.m. next day, with a view to his being tried for the Eight.

Such a request being, like Royal requests, equivalent to a command, was, of course, acceded to; and next day the red-headed Northumbrian duly presented himself at the 'Varsity Barge. He was a weird, ungainly-looking mortal, out of a boat, with awkward, dour manners, who had but little to say for himself, and that little marked by a strong North Country burr. The President tried to engage him in friendly conversation, without much success, while the other occupants of the barge stared at him as though he were some new and uncouth sort of beast.

They opened their eyes when this weird person was directed to occupy the stroke thwart; but still more did they open their eyes to see the sudden transformation that took place in him when the craft pushed off and swung away at a strong paddle.

It was like the difference between a swan on land and a swan in the water. The gaunt, gawky lout, losing in an instant all his awkwardness, fell to his work, in polished style, with all the ease and assurance of the master. Presently the word was given to row. And he took them down to Iffley, at thirty-five, in a way that did the coach's heart good to see. No flurry! No bustle! Every stroke rowed through from start to finish! And somehow, as if by magic, he seemed to gauge the exact capacity of the men behind him, and to infuse into them a homogeneity that they had not before displayed. There was no doubt that here was a natural genius—a born stroke. That afternoon's trial settled the question once and for all, and made, in six short minutes, the reputation of Sandy McTavish.

A fortnight before the race, Jim Cuthbertson's hand was quite well again. But there was now no question of his being reinstated at his old thwart, McTavish having, in the meanwhile, proved himself decidedly the better man. Nor did the form and the coolness of head he had shown during practice desert the gawky Northumbrian on the eventful day of the race, when, with a distinctly moderate lot behind him, and with the betting 3 to 1 on Cambridge, he very nearly upset the odds by rowing the Light Blues to a short front canvas, in somewhere about ten seconds outside record time.

On the Monday after the race, McTavish, now a public hero, returned to his Northumbrian home—(his father, a self-made man, was in business, in a large way, at Gateshead)—and Cuthbertson, who also lived in the North of England, travelled with him.

They went in a smoker, for Cuthbertson's benefit; the latter, when not in training, being a veritable chimney. McTavish did not smoke. His serious mind regarded the practice as a useless, almost vicious, luxury, not to say a sinful waste of good money. He whiled away the tedium of the journey partly by reading The Economist (his favourite publication), and partly by conversing with his companion.

"Cuthbertson," he said, in the course of the occasional observations, with which he punctuated his reading, "I'm no denyin' ye managed it varra weel; but sax hundred pun is a lot o' money."

"May be," smiled Cuthbertson. "But I wouldn't have sacrificed myself even for that, unless my financial affairs had compelled me. Besides, after all, McTavish, your governor could very well afford it."

"Oo aye," replied the canny Northumbrian, "I'm no sayin' my feyther couldna afford it. But sax hundred sovereigns—sax hundred golden sovereigns, Cuthbertson. It was a deal to pay juist for a seat in a boat."

Cuthbertson laughed.

"Nothing out of the way, considering all the circumstances," he rejoined. "You know both you and your governor were dead set on your getting your Blue, McTavish; and you know, also, that, coming as you did from an obscure provincial grammar school, without friends or influence at the 'Varsity, you'd never have had an earthly of attracting the President's attention, unless the oracle had been worked for you."

"I'm no denyin' that, Cuthbertson," admitted McTavish

"Besides," went on the other, "think of the risk I ran, when I arranged with Tommy English to shove my arm, accidentally on purpose, through Basingstoke's window. I might have been maimed for life, you loon. It was more by luck than by judgment that I wasn't, I can tell you."

"What ye say is verra true," assented the prudent Northumbrian, wagging his red head, sagaciously; "but for a' that, sax hundred pun is a muckle bit o' siller, James Cuthbertson."

MUSIC.

SOME OPERATIC RUMOURS AND REPORTS.

AMONG a good many operatic rumours which have been in the air lately none is more interesting than that which has hinted at the possibility of Covent Garden joining forces with the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The fact that Mr. H. V. Higgins (ingenuously described in one quarter as "brother of Lady de Grey") has recently been on a visit to the States was quite enough to set the ball rolling, and though it has been officially denied that any such notion has ever been so much as thought of in Bow-street, there is no doubt that if it could be brought about, an arrangement of this kind, or, at all events, a working understanding between the two houses, would not be without its advantages. In particular it might be expected to result, as has been pointed out, in a considerable reduction in the fees paid at present to the leading artists—a consummation which, though it might not be hailed with enthusiasm by the latter, is one most decidedly to be wished in the interests of opera as a whole. Under this arrangement the joint management would be able to offer virtually continuous engagements of some six or eight months, in which circumstances they would obviously be in a position to make better terms than at present.

There is no doubt that the fees which are being paid nowadays to the star artists alike in New York and London are out of all reason, and any scheme which seems likely to bring about a healthier state of things in this respect is worthy of serious consideration. A good tenor or a first-rate soprano is no doubt a very rare article, and one which has to be paid for accordingly; but this does not in the least explain or justify the fact that a scale of fees obtains in London and New York, which, speaking generally, is absolutely unknown elsewhere. It would not matter so much if opera in this country were a prosperous and flourishing institution, earning big profits, and enabling the public to get their seats at the lowest rates. Unfortunately, as is well known, it is nothing of the kind. If it just pays its way without any profit to the shareholders and at high prices to the public, this is as much as is ever expected, and it is the enormous fees demanded by the principal singers which, more than any other single circumstance, probably is responsible for this undesirable state of things.

In the case of Covent Garden, seeing that the syndicate have the field so entirely to themselves it might be thought that they would not be so readily squeezed, but the public would be astonished if they learnt the actual fees paid to some of the better-known vocalists. As to New York, matters are even worse, especially at present, thanks to the competition of the rival managers, Conried and Hammerstein, for all the available talent. It does not do to believe all that one reads in this way, of course. It is probably quite untrue, for instance, that Caruso, the chief star of the Metropolitan during the past season, has taken advantage of the situation to ask precisely double his previous fees as a condition precedent to his continuing to sing for Mr. Conried; but apparently there is no doubt as to his not appearing at the Metropolitan next season, and instead, Mr. Conried has, it is reported, secured for his leading tenor next year Signor Bonci, who, during the past season, has been Mr. Hammerstein's bright particular star at the Manhattan. The latter, in his turn, announces that he has signed a five years' contract with Signor Zenatello to take Bonci's place; and so the game goes merrily on.

It is all very amusing, and rather absurd from one point of view, but hardly from that of the public who, in the long run, have to pay in one way or another for these beggar-my-neighbour proceedings. Then, as if this were not enough, comes the further startling and, of course, strictly veracious report that Mme. Melba proposes to take a hand in the game by erecting yet a third opera house in New York, which she will run herself. Mme. Melba is no doubt a clever business woman, as well as an accomplished artist, but personally I shall believe in that opera house when I see it, and I hardly think that it will be necessary to go to America for that purpose. Altogether, what with the "Salome" affair and other features, matters operatic in New York of late would seem to have been quite exceptionally lively.

As to the operatic outlook at home, all the signs seem to point to a successful season. The subscription is said to be larger than ever, while the advance booking for the opening festival performances of the "Ring" and "Die Meistersinger" is understood to have been very brisk.

Among recent concerts there has been none more interesting, perhaps, than that given by the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society. Finer glee-singing has not been heard in London for many a long day, and it was only to be regretted that the audience was so scanty. A vocal concert of another kind was Mr. David Bispham's recital, at which some of Mme. Liza Lehmann's pretty "Vicar of Wakefield" music was heard, along with other things. At the Chappell Ballad Concert, on Saturday—the last but one of the present series—the absence of M. Maurel (indisposed) was a disappointment to many, but there was plenty, even so, to engage the attention of a huge audience throughout the afternoon. Among several new songs heard, Mr. Hermann Löhr's "Messmates" (words by Henry Newbolt) has character and strength. An interesting work heard at the last Nora Clench Quartet concert was Max Reger's quartet in D (Op. 74). It is very, very Regerish, but daylight glimmers through the forest here and there. Mr. Frank Bridge's "Idylls," introduced on Friday by the Grimson Quartet, are thoughtful and agreeable little pieces. At the last of the Wessely Quartet concerts César Franck's pianoforte quintet in F minor was to have been given, but at the last moment the intention was abandoned. Violinists appearing recently have included Herr Floris Ondricek and Signor Antonietti (capable artists both), and Mr. Leonard Borwick and M. Jacques Pentel have given piano recitals. On Monday, at the London Symphony Orchestra's concert, Mr. Harold Bauer was heard in Tchaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto, and "Ein Heldenleben" was also in the programme. In the afternoon Mme. Eleanor Cleaver Simon and Mr. Ingo Simon joined forces in an enjoyable vocal recital.

Reports are current of important ballad concert developments in the not very distant future. Thus an entirely new series of concerts of this class will, it is understood, be started by Messrs. Enoch and Co., the well-known publishers, in the autumn at the new hall which it is proposed to erect in Great Portland-street. Even more interesting is the project ascribed to Mr. Arthur Boosey, of taking the Albert Hall for the next season of his well-known London Ballad Concerts; and so well advanced is the latter scheme that many important contracts have, I hear, already been entered into. Mme. Melba, among others, may, it is whispered, appear at these concerts.

The season of German comic opera at the Adelphi has been fixed to open on April 15 and to run for two months. It will thus have to withstand the competition of Covent Garden, where the season opens on April 30, and it may be hoped that it will not suffer too seriously thereby. I am afraid it is just possible, however, that disappointment may be in store for the promoters of the venture. It is understood that the undertaking will entail a very large outlay—indeed, Herr Gregor, the manager of the company, has stated that he will have to take at least £450 a night to make the thing pay. Apparently, however, he has boundless faith in the drawing powers of Offenbach's "Hoffmann's Erzählungen," which he hopes will see him right through the season. I hope so, too, though I have my doubts.

The wedding of Mr. Neil Forsyth and Miss Mary Helen Cathcart on Thursday will take not a few southrons to far-away Musselburgh. Mr. Forsyth's entrance on married life will coincide happily with the initiation of his career as full-fledged manager of Covent Garden.

and every one will hope that in each capacity destiny may have nothing but good in store for him.

The suggestion which has been made (in the Tribune) that, now that Sir August Manns has gone, the next musical knighthood might appropriately be bestowed on Mr. H. J. Wood, who has done such splendid work in the same field, brings to mind the fact that Manns afforded one of the few instances in which knighthoods have been conferred on purely executant musicians. Sir Michael Costa and Sir Julius Benedict supplied similar cases, but nearly all the many other musical knights have owed their distinction either to their having held Court or other official appointments or to their work as composers or professors. Mr. H. J. Wood would certainly make a popular knight. The late Sir August Manns, by the way, was one of the few knights who have received the distinction without going "on the knee." He was suffering from gout at the time, and was, therefore, excused by the King.

Music-lovers will have read with regret of the death of Otto Hegner, who made such a stir in his younger days as a prodigy, and many, by no means veterans, who recall him as a small boy in knickerbockers who thrilled the hearts of feminine audiences at St. James's Hall, will note with something of a shock that he has passed away at the age of thirty-one. Certainly it is hard to realise that twenty years and more have passed since he and Josef Hofmann were astonishing all London as the rival prodigies of the time.

By the will of the late Mr. Charles James Oldham, F.R.C.S., of Brighton, the British Museum will become possessed of some valuable Stradivari instruments, in the shape of the violins known as the "Rode" and "Spanish," the "Spanish" viola and the "Christina" 'cello. I believe it is a fact that this is actually the first time that any Stradivari instruments have been left to any museum or similar institution in England, though Scotland and Ireland have both been more fortunate. In the case of Scotland, the late Mr. J. G. Orchar, of Broughty Ferry, near Dundee, some few years ago bequeathed a fine Stradivari and a fine Guarnerius to the local museum at Broughty Ferry; while some years previous to the Orchar bequest a "Strad" violin was left to the Royal Irish Academy of Music in Dublin.

The Stradivari left by Mr. Orchar and the "Rode" Stradivari left by Mr. Oldham to the British Museum both belonged at one time to the late M. Lamoureux, and some may find cause for regret in the fact that two such beautiful instruments should henceforth be condemned to perpetual silence. It has even been suggested before now that in the case of instruments of this description they should be lent from time to time to approved performers. But this, of course, would raise considerable difficulties, as, for instance, the possibility of an inferior instrument being substituted for the original when it came to their being returned. In any case, it may be taken for granted that the British Museum authorities will not entertain any suggestion of this kind, and in their custody the instruments in question have a very fair chance of lasting about as long as the British Empire.

The date of the Santley jubilee concert has now been definitely fixed for May 1, when it is probable that, for once in a way, even the Albert Hall will prove too small to hold all who will wish to be present. The programme will be one of the strongest of its kind ever presented. Meanwhile a testimonial fund has been opened, to which donations are invited by the hon. treasurer, Sir Douglas Straight, Royal Albert Hall, S.W.

When "Z.," a member of the Stock Exchange Orchestra, took Mr. Plunket Greene to task the other day (in the columns of Musical News) for having declined to sing Stanford's "Sea Songs" at the high pitch, he was surely overlooking the fact that that popular vocalist is a doughty son of Erin, and not one, therefore, to take such strictures lying down. He is, at all events, likely to remember for some time the severe castigation administered to him by Mr. Greene in his complete and crushing rejoinder, which he rounded off as follows:—

"Z" owes me an apology I shall be at his service on either evening.

"Z." replies this week as follows:—

He has challenged me to meet him on the 15th or 20th inst. I have far too much regard for Mr. Arthur Payne than to be a party to a discussion, perhaps an angry one, on the evening of the final rehearsal, or the concert. We can do better than that. I am at Mr. Greene's disposal any day in the next two weeks from ten till four o'clock, except on Saturdays or Sundays. If he will notify the hour of his arrival, I will take care to be in and not disappoint him of an interview. Mr. Spurling can give him my address.

Clearly a case of pistols for two and coffee for one. In the immortal words of Simon Tappertit, "Something will come of this; I hope it mayn't be human gore."

In connection with M. Bruneau's new opera, "Nais Micoulin," it has been remarked that he stands alone in having had the courage to introduce operatic characters in ordinary conventional attire; but this is hardly the case. While "Le Rêve," in which the men wear frock coats and top hats, was no doubt one of the first operas so distinguished, there have been others since from other hands, one of the latest examples being Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," while Giordano's "Fédora" is another.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Sir Spencer Walpole's "Studies in Biography" (1)—reprints from the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and New Reviews—might have been written from the text of Burke's denunciation of politics as "trickery and treachery," especially if you include international politics in your definition. In home politics Disraeli certainly bears the palm for unconscionable opportunism. To take one or two flagrant instances. In 1827 Disraeli, in "Popanilla," ridiculed delightfully the Corn Laws. In Vraibleusa—the scene of that romance—it was the law of the land that the islanders should purchase their corn only of the Aboriginal; and when the Vraibleusians, finding that they had to pay its weight in gold for their corn, remonstrated, the Aboriginal demonstratively proved to them that all their profits were derived from his income. In 1843 he defended the Corn Laws as an outwork of the landed interest. In 1845 he reverted to his original position and described the Revolution as "a memorable epoch that had presented England at the same time with a Corn Law and a public debt." In 1846, upon the revolt from Peel of the country gentlemen, Disraeli saw his chance and put himself at their head as the protagonist of Protection. In 1852, when the Government, of which he was a member, introduced Bills to deal with the Irish Land question, he complained of the omission from the fourth of these Bills of "what I consider its vital clause—that which gave compensation and even retrospective compensation for improvements." When, however, Gladstone made this a vital clause of his Bill, Disraeli denounced it as "a policy of confiscation." When Peel charged Disraeli with such opportune inconsistencies, and attributed them to his disappointment at having been refused office, Disraeli denied that he had ever directly or indirectly solicited office, declaring that "nothing could be more foreign to his nature than an application for place." But in the Peel correspondence, published by Mr. Parker, there is a letter from Disraeli, not merely applying for office, but concluding his application thus:—"I confess to be unrecognised by you at this moment appears to me to be overwhelming, and I appeal to your own heart to save me from an intolerable humiliation."

In the same correspondence are two other urgent letters of application—one from Mrs. Disraeli asking for office for her husband, and the other from Disraeli asking for a place for his brother. It is curious, by the way, that Sir Spencer Walpole does not recognise as plagiarisms two passages he praises from the speeches of Disraeli: the famous "exhausted volcanoes" passage—taken from Wilkes—and a simile which is for ever recurring in Disraeli's speeches and writings—"bad wine produces good vinegar"—which he found in his father's essay on proverbs, "Guardati d'aceto di vin dolce," "Beware of the vinegar of sweet wine." It is, however, when you come to international politics and read Sir Spencer Walpole's essays on Bismarck and Napoleon III., that you realise how kind fortune was to these men in placing them in positions where wholesale robbery and murder win a crown and not a cross: "Ille crucem sceleris pretium tulit; hic diadema." Bismarck especially realises Fielding's ideal of "Jonathan Wild the Great." He suggested so cynically the annexation through war of the territory of his neighbours that King William thought he was drunk, and the Crown Prince supposed him to have gone mad. And when his suggestions were ultimately one and all carried out, he was as cold-blooded in executing them as he was unscrupulous in proposing them. In the Franco-Prussian War he complained: "Our people are very good marksmen, but bad executioners. Every village in which an act of treachery has been committed should be burned to the ground, and all the male inhabitants hanged." He did not approve of the taking of prisoners: "I should have been better pleased if they had all been corpses." He thus advised Jules Favre during the Versailles negotiations: "Provoquez donc une émeute pendant que vous avez encore une armée pour l'étouffer." From first to last Bismarck was cynically unscrupulous and brutally callous, and I cannot agree with Sir Spencer Walpole in considering "morbid" the slight flicker of remorse which shot up in the Chancellor's conscience in his old age. On one Sunday in October, 1877, he said to Busch:

> I have had little satisfaction in my political life. I have made no one happy thereby, neither myself, nor my family, nor others. On the other hand, I have caused great unhappiness to great numbers. But for me, three great wars would not have taken place; eighty thousand men would not have been killed, and be mourned to-day by parents, brothers, sisters, and widows.

"The story of the Empire," says Sir Spencer Walpole in his paper on Napoleon III., "is the story of a crime, and the story of the Emperor is the story of a conspirator"; and, indeed, the Emperor, though incomparably more amiable and less decided and drastic than Bismarck, was not far his inferior in unscrupulousness. The cost in blood and tears of the coup d'état alone was but a presage of the cost in blood and tears of the Second Empire to France. "None will ever know," says Kinglake, "the number of men who at this period were either killed or imprisoned in France or sent to die in Africa or Cayenne; but the panegyrist of Louis Bonaparte and his fellow-plotters acknowledges that the number of people who were seized and transported within the few weeks that followed the 2nd of December amounted to the enormous number of twenty-six thousand five hundred." All the papers in this fascinating volume of Sir Spencer Walpole's—on Peel, Cobden, Disraeli, Lord Dufferin, Gibbon, Bismarck, Napoleon III., and Lord Shaftesbury—are well worthy of their famous subjects.

In the preface to a very brilliant novel "Her Majesty's Rebels" (2), Mr. Sidney Royse Lysaght admits the points of resemblance between the public career of his hero and that of Parnell, but denies that Michael Desmond is intended for a portrait of the Irish National leader. If, however, he had studied the character as well as the career of Parnell for reproduction in "Her Majesty's Rebels," he would have made his hero more intelligible, more sympathetic, and more convincing. As it is, you neither care much yourself for Michael Desmond, nor can you understand the enthusiasm for him in Ireland. The truth is, you cannot have an adequate "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out, and you cannot have the situation Parnell created in Ireland with Parnell left out. On the other hand, Michael's brother (the real hero), the heroine (Kathleen O'Brien), and, indeed, nearly all the Irish characters are both sympathetic and convincing, while this admirably-written novel is full of the most thrilling situations. I cannot say that "Benedict Kavanagh" (3) abounds in thrilling situations, but it is a brillant political novel, whose sketches of persons and parties in the Ireland of to-day are drawn by the keenest and not unkindest of observers. There is not much story, but what there is serves its admirable purpose of pointing the moral of Irish regeneration. "We sentimentalise," says Father O'Meara. "We dream. We create a Celticism such as never was in our poems and our plays. We shroud heroic figures in mists of our own imagination, and then, because they loom dim, we call them great. All the while we are missing the essential thing about them. They were brave men. Fighting for good causes or for bad, for Ireland or for themselves, at least they fought. They did not shrink from facing long odds, or despair of bringing half-lost battles to victorious ends. This is the spirit which we want."

What will you say to a novel with little or no story, or at least incident, which yet absorbs you from the first page to the last? I really do not know when I read a novel at once so simple, so natural, so humorous, and so interesting through its simplicity, naturalness, and humour, as Mr. Archibald Marshall's "Exton Manor" (4). It is not too much to say that it recalls the art of Jane Austen and of Anthony Trollope, and heralds perhaps a return to the style of novel which charmed our youth. Different, indeed, is Mr. Richard Bagot's startling story of "Temptation" (5), whose Italian temptress is an extraordinarily natural, powerful, and fascinating study. Indeed, every character in the novel and its every scene—which is laid in familiar ground to Mr. Bagot, Italy—are masterly drawn, and lead up with consummate skill to its tragic close.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

A new edition of "Napoleon's Campaign in Poland: 1806-7," by F. Loraine Petre, is being brought out this week by Mr. John Lane. This is the most complete and accurate military history of the campaign in the English language, and the new edition—which has sixteen full-page illustrations and three maps—makes an opportune appearance, seeing that the Staff College has chosen this particular campaign as a subject for its coming examination.

"Peaceful Personalities and Warriors Bold," is the title of a volume of reminiscences by Mr. Frederic Villiers which Messrs. Harper are issuing this week. As befits a book by a famous artist and special correspondent, it will have a large number of illustrations.

Mr. Arthur W. àBeckett's "Recollections of a Humorist" (Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, 12s. 6d. net) make a very entertaining volume. The author was for a short time in the Civil Service, but his book is mainly concerned with his varied experiences as a journalist, more especially during the long period of his assistant-editorship of Punch. He introduces the reader to many famous and interesting men and women, he relates plenty of amusing stories, and he gives some pleasant glimpses of the literary and social life of the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The Rev. Father Hugh Benson's new book, "The Papers of a Pariah," is being published this week by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., in England, and by Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co., in the United States. It is a volume of religious interest. At the time the papers were written the author had not entered the Roman Catholic Church, and their point of view is that of one who regards the Church from without, not from within, though with a favourable eye.

The buying of a horse is notoriously a risky business for amateurs, but still a good many are either unwilling or else find it inconvenient to secure professional assistance. Chiefly for their guidance Mr. F. T. Barton, a veterinary surgeon, already well-known as an author, has written a book on "Horses: Their Selection and Purchase," which Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are publishing. The book has a number of illustrations which enhance its practical value.

Mr. E. V. Lucas has carefully revised his "Life of Charles Lamb" for the cheap edition which Messrs. Methuen announce. Hitherto this successful biography has only been obtainable in two costly volumes. In the new edition the most interesting of the original illustrations are retained, but the appendices have been removed.

"My Prison Life," by Jabez Spencer Balfour (Chapman and Hall, price 6s.), is not a mere reprint of the articles which he has been contributing to various newspapers, but is to all intents and purposes a new work. It is very readable and instructive as a description of convict life, and well worthy of the attention of all who are interested in the reform of our system of penal servitude. The defects of the system are clearly shown. It fails to reform the first offender, and the presence in our prisons of an ever-increasing number of convicts who have served sentence after sentence shows that it "does not deter and cannot truly punish." One practice which the author severely condemns—and rightly so—is the employment in mechanical labour of men who have never used any mechanical tools in their lives. No purpose whatever is served by putting "a middle-aged or elderly banker, lawyer, doctor, or shopkeeper, still less a clergyman or dissenting minister," to work as a bricklayer, plumber, shoemaker, or tailor. It is a mere waste of time and energy, a delusion and a farce, and some rational system of useful employment ought to be adopted for such prisoners.

A gap in the biographies of naval celebrities is filled by Mr. Fisher Unwin's publication of "Admiral Vernon and his Times" (10s. 6d. net). This memoir of the "Old Grog" of the days of George II.—the nickname was earned by his courageous abolition of the naval custom of drinking raw rum—is in the nature of a vindication, with sidelights on the Parliamentary intrigues of Sir Robert Walpole and others with reference to the navy. Vernon was a fighting man both at sea and in Parliament, and the story of his career in the light of great national events is full of interest. The author, Mr. Douglas Ford, has had access to valuable family and official records; and the book is abundantly illustrated.

Mr. C. Guise Mitford has chosen an unhackneyed background for the charming idyll he sets himself to portray in "Izelle of the Dunes" (John Long, 6s.), and his pictures of Dutch life and Dutch scenery alone would make the book worth reading. But in addition the love story of Izelle and the wandering English artist is delightfully treated. Izelle is the unsophisticated half-child, half-woman, who, unfortunately, hardly exists outside the pages of fiction, but is all the more welcome when she is to be found there. Mr. Mitford's readers will thank him for a new and delightful acquaintance.

"Three Vagabonds in Friesland, with a Yacht and Camera" (Simpkin Marshall, 7s. 6d. net) may be heartily commended, not only to those who wish to make acquaintance with a little known portion of Holland, but to the legion of vagabonds to whom it is dedicated. It is a leisurely volume and very pleasantly Mr. H. F. Tomalin discourses of the "land of miniature," while his colleague, Mr. Arthur Marshall, is busy capturing impressions of the country and its people with his camera. The result is a happy one. The three men in a boat whose experiences are chronicled herein not only seem to have thoroughly enjoyed their holiday in Friesland, but they succeed in conveying their enjoyment to others.

In "The Flare of the Footlights" (Grant Richards, 6s.) Mr. Horace Wyndham has produced a companion volume to "Audrey the Actress." Audrey was a study of the feminine moth who is attracted by the stage candle, while "The Flare of the Footlights" treats of the experiences of a young man who adopts "the" profession at the instigation of an actress-manageress who falls in love with him. Mr. Wyndham's stage land is not a pleasant place, and disillusionment of stage glamour lies in wait for his readers, but there is much to be said for the writer who deals "faithfully," in its old Puritan sense, with his subject, and this Mr. Wyndham does—wittily as well.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—You may possibly remember that a few weeks ago I wrote you about the incompetence of English girls of the upper middle class in household accomplishments and the desirability of their acquiring them. Well, dear, I have just heard of a most agreeable manner of doing so, one which almost confutes the old proverb which tells us that there is no royal road to learning. If for the word "royal" we may read "easy and pleasant," then there certainly is to be found such a road to the acquirement of the important lore of housewifery, the knowledge of cookery, dressmaking, and the outdoor arts of riding, driving, shooting, hunting—to say nothing of the milder joys of tennis, croquet, and other games. A family in beautiful Buckinghamshire, by the way, are ready to receive ladies in their pleasant home, give them all the instruction referred to above, supply horses for riding, keep a liberal table, and take their pupil guests to tennis and picnic parties. It sounds ideal, does it not? The daughters of the family are competent to teach the domestic arts, and even pillow-lace making, and are expert horsewomen. What a chance for the brides of the immediate future to graduate in the science of home-making and have a good time while taking their degree.

The new Sutro play at the St. James's is wonderfully gowned; indeed, it would be rather nice to have the ladies of the cast parade before the curtain for five minutes previous to each act. Then we could thoroughly examine their clothes, and settle down to the play with free minds. Miss Eva Moore's frocks are charming, especially her striped tan-and-white silk. It is made with bretelles, over a white broderie anglaise blouse, the bretelles being held together with heavy white silk cord braided into motifs, with tassels. The folded belt of black glacé has long ends broadening to the hem, where they are embroidered in high relief with clusters of cherries. The toque is composed of cherries and dark green blade-like leaves, and a cherry-red sunshade goes with the dress. Then Miss Moore, at the Embassy garden party, wears a wonderful painted chiffon gown, chiefly white, with faint pink roses on a broad band of pale blue, and grey-black ribbons painted in a wandering design of bows. The dress is bordered with lace, and made over white. The bolero bodice has a cluster of pink roses in front, and the dear little lace sleeves are tied up with blue ribbon edged with silver. With this frock Miss Moore wears a toque of pale blue chip, with a great chou of silver ribbon veiled with blue chiffon, and a pale blue ostrich feather, whose long, slightly curled fronds are tipped with mauve.

Miss Helen Ferrers looks very handsome in her lovely gowns, particularly in one of deep rose-coloured chiffon, heavily embroidered with appliqué velvet in the same shade, and deeply hemmed with velvet. On the front of the bodice a heavy embroidery of gold is lightly veiled by a loose piece of the chiffon, edged with rose-coloured embroidery. Both hat and sunshade are in shades of copper, and the latter has a green and red head of some mysterious water-bird where the ferrule usually is, and forms the handle.

But Miss Henrietta Watson, as an American princess, has the chief sartorial glories literally on her shoulders. Her coral-pink silk evening dress is embroidered with coral and gold, and is worn with a coral diadem; but her garden-party dress is a most wonderful affair. The full skirt is of Alençon lace in deep écru, with gold braid laid on the inner side simulating a pelerine. The little Directoire coat of amber glacé has long ends embroidered in gold bugles, and caught at the waist by two large round studs of cornelian that exactly match the waistband. The bodice is of lace and embroidery, and the whole colouring of the dress is summed up in the hat of gold-coloured chip with a large black-headed bird with plumage ranging from amber to copper. There are enough ideas in the St. James's costumes to last us through a year's frocks.

The mid-Lent Ball was held this year in the beautiful ballroom of the Ritz Hotel, a splendid room which is highly appreciated by the givers of smart dances. The corridor looked quite lovely decorated in a scheme graduated from lemon to deep, rich orange, the flowers being chiefly azaleas. The ballroom was all pink tulips, and the white and gold archways were hung with smilax and flowers arranged in long fringes like curtains, and swaying delicately. The occasion was, as usual, extremely smart. Many of the Ambassadors were present, or were represented by their wives and daughters, secretaries, and attachés. No one appreciates a good floor better than our Continental visitors, whose waltzing is a dream. There were many pretty girls present, and the ballroom was pronounced to be a most becoming room.

At the Ritz also is to be held the Royal Irish Industries Exhibition on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. The Princess of Wales and the Duchess of Argyll have promised to be present, and, as ever, the cream of our high society will officiate as either stall-holders or assistants. This sale is always a beauty show, and it is our joy to get into a corner and watch the lovely faces pass. It affords a study in gowns, as well, and I shall enjoy telling you all about it.

You remember the Windsor Crèche Ball I told you of, held in the Wharncliffe Rooms? Princess Christian was much pleased with the £100 handed over for the crèche, in which her Royal Highness takes a deep and kindly interest, and consequently the Princess has given her patronage to a ball in aid of the Loughborough Hospital, which is being organised by Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen, and will be held in May in town. The precise date is not fixed. It is sure to be a success, as the Windsor dance was, for the arrangements will be in the same hands, and every one was pleased with the hot supper with good wine, all included in the guinea tickets.

The annual exhibition of the Royal Amateur Art Society was interesting as ever this year. It was held at Lady Naylor Leyland's beautiful London house last Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Princess Alexander of Teck, looking very girlish and pretty, opened it, and handed the prizes to the successful competitors. The King lent four fine prints from Windsor Castle, and many other owners sent pictures of children. It was a good idea to limit the collection to portraits of children under seventeen. Several great ladies sent exhibits to the general section. Princess Henry of Battenberg sent a screen embroidered by herself in a design of B's and Tudor roses. The enamels lent by Princess Louise Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein were much admired. Landscapes and portraits were sent by the Duchess of Buckingham, the Duchess of Somerset, the Duchess of Rutland, Lady Marjorie Manners, the Speaker, his wife and daughter, Lord Berwick, Lady Maitland, and Lady Wenlock.

A lucrative section is that of the pictures presented by artists and amateurs, to be sold for the charities to which the proceeds of the exhibition are devoted. Lady Maxwell-Lyte had charge of this department, and arranged the hundred pictures with her usual skill. Dr. Emil Reich was present, and lectured on art. Among other things, he said that the woman with a charming smile was more highly gifted than the woman who writes clever books or gives lectures. What, then, must he think of those gifted beings who manage to combine the pretty smile and charming manner with sufficient brains to produce widely read books? A combination of youth, beauty, and brains is not unknown. What a different view Dr. Emil Reich takes from that entertained by the terrible Schopenhauer on the subject of women. They represent the two extremes.

We are all beginning to think of our gardens now. We spent a week at our riverside home, and it was lovely to hear the birds sing in the mornings and to realise that spring is really on the way. The rose-trees are all a-flush with tiny green leaves folded tightly against the frost. The hyacinths, daffodils, and tulips are coming romping up, and the sweet little snowdrops are beginning to weary of this wicked world and preparing to leave us. What a contrast they make to the flaunting gold and purple of the crocus. And how delicately, in comparison, the snowdrop dies, shrinking and gently fading, while the crocus sprawls its vivid leaves, taking the whole neighbourhood into its confidence without reserve.

We are sorely tempted to spend more money than we can afford on the very pretty garden furniture and ornaments illustrated in a catalogue sent us from the Pyghtle Works at Bedford. The garden seats are quite different from any we have ever seen before. The backs are higher, and the seats much wider, so that one can comfortably lounge upon them, a thing impossible in the narrow limits of the usual bench. The "Radley" is 5ft. 6in. long, and with cushions would make an ideal resting-place for a siesta. It has, besides, a seat at either end, so that if the sun comes round at one, as it has a way of doing, a position in a different aspect is available by moving a yard or so.

Some of the shapes are classical, recalling Leighton's and Alma Tadema's pictures, and would give an air of great refinement to one's garden. Some are specially designed for Italian gardens. Sundials, trellis arbours, pergole, and summer-houses are among the other fascinating things illustrated, also pigeon cotes, arches, rustic bridges, and fences, and other adjuncts of landscape gardening. The "seat of the thirteen hearts" and table to match, designed by the Hon. Mrs. Anstruther, look as comfortable in shape as they are poetically named.

I always share with you every discovery that I think would be either useful or amusing, do I not? I must therefore tell you about a curiously named little machine whose acquaintance we have lately made. It is called the "Veedee," but we give it the sounding title of the "40-h.p. lady's maid." The cleverest maid in the world could not do one-hundredth part of what this marvellous little machine does. As you know, the world has wondered over the increasing number of pretty women during the last few years, and the wonderful increase of good complexions. Both, no doubt, are due to massage, but that has always been a tedious and a costly process, open only to those who have both money and leisure. But here comes in our 40 h.p. friend the Veedee, a small hand machine, easily worked by a handle, which is to ordinary massage what the motor is to a donkey-cart. Its action is simple enough. By its rapid vibrations it imparts energy to the muscles beneath the skin that have, from one cause or another, become flabby and relaxed. The "rubbing" of the masseuse, which has worked such wonders for beauty during the last ten years, is by the Veedee performed in one-fiftieth part of the time, and at practically hardly any cost. Besides this, it has a curiously stimulating effect upon the whole system, freeing the circulation from lassitude, and arousing the torpid liver to a practical sense of its important duties. Mabel, who works hard, says she has for years been longing to be able to feel as energetic in the afternoons as she does in the mornings. And in this little machine, which she can work with her own hand with the greatest ease, she has found what she longed for.

Complexion is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, point of good looks in a woman, and the action of the Veedee on the little vessels that contain the colouring pigment is to energise them, the vibrations causing them to fulfil the functions for which Nature intended them, but in the performance of which they have become lax, with a consequent muddy dulness of skin, or, what is even worse, a fixed, hard colour on the upper part of the cheeks. You must send for one to Southwark-street, if not for use in the cause of vanity (important enough in its way, is it not?), then as a gentle reliever of pain. Not only does it remove wrinkles and crow's feet, but it does far higher work for the sufferer from rheumatism. It was poor Milly, a martyr for years to rheumatic pains, who first told us about the Veedee. She was recommended to use it by her doctor. Instead of nights of constant pain, she now enjoys hours of restoring sleep, and is already able to get about in the daytime instead of being crippled and a prisoner on her sofa.

I could tell you much more about it, but as I insist on your getting one at once, I leave you to find out its benefits for yourself.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Most of us are sun-worshippers at heart, and no wonder! Does it not make all the difference in the world to have the sun constantly with us? To have his risings early and his settings late, and, above everything, to have the former—real, bona fide risings, flooding the days with brightness and light. The light cure for human ills is a very old one; sunshine is the greatest and best of nerve tonics. What courage light gives us as compared to darkness and gloom. What hopefulness in endeavour, and extra strength in the ordinary struggles of life. Our spirits are sensibly raised by the lengthening of the days; things never seem to matter quite so much when we are emerging into spring as they do when we are getting deeper and deeper still into winter. Come what come may, we have light, and the promise of more to come, to hearten us. The sunshine stirs the principle of life within us, as it does the sap in the trees and the grass. We had much sunshine last week, and the call of the spring in the air; but for all that we fear that the case is rather that of au revoir, than of good-bye, with winter. We feel that he is still looking back at us over his shoulder, and in the state known to human beings as that of "being between two minds," whether to come back or go quite away.

The Castle season ends this week, and with St. Patrick's Ball as usual. The Lace Ball last week, for which there had been so much preparation and which caused so many expectations, came off with great éclat. The only drawback was Lady Aberdeen's illness. She was, however, brave enough to be present at the ball for an hour or so, though far from well, and obliged to be wheeled in a chair. She had the gratification, which no doubt did her good, of seeing the success of an entertainment planned to please, as one may say, all down the line, to extend happiness from the Court to the cottage. Lady Aberdeen's sapphire dress was covered with the beautiful Irish point lace, which bears so much resemblance to the old "point de Venise." The specially got-up quadrilles and reels were danced in front of the Viceregal dais in St. Patrick's Hall. The quadrilles were organised by Ladies Clementine Waring, Hawkesbury, Mayo, Holmpatrick, and Grenfell. The ladies in each quadrille were dressed alike in special costumes and lace of a special kind—all Irish, of course—point, Carrickmacross, Limerick and Youghal. The men wore Court dress, black velvet with lace ruffles and jabots. Amongst those taking part in the dances were Ladies Wicklow, Powerscourt, Celia Coates, Violet Brabazon, Mabel and Violet Anson, Gweneth Ponsonby, Bessborough, Dunsany, Hon. Sybil Hamilton, the Hon. Clare Hamilton, Hon. Zoe Maxwell, the Misses Nesta Fitzgerald, Alice Carr Glyn, Arnott, Post, Victoria Bigg, and Lady Blanche Seymour. Amongst the men who took part were the Viceregal staff, the Lord Chancellor, Lords Mayo, Powerscourt, Grenfell, Hawkesbury, Colonel C. Crichton, Sir John Arnott, Sir Anthony Weldon. The four-handed Irish reels got up by Ladies Weldon, MacDonnell, Countess Plunkett, and others, were very picturesque and effective, and toned down to graceful courtliness. Lady Weldon's four ladies wore beautiful costumes of mauve chiffon,

SANDOW PRONOUNCED

THE

HEALTHIEST MAN IN BRITAIN

AND

INSURED FOR £20,000.

HIS ADVICE TO AILING READERS OF "TRUTH."

I have just been examined by the medical advisers of the Norwich Union Insurance Society, accepted by them as a first-class life, and insured for £20,000, at the lowest possible rates.

WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?

It means that although I was a very delicate boy, I have, by means of a scientific system of Physical Education of my own, secured the physical development and the sound, vigorous constitution I now possess.

But the point is this. I claim—nay, I go further, I guarantee—to pass every ailing man or woman whose case I judge to be amenable to my exercise cure, as a first-class life, and that often within a very short time.

The thousands of readers of this paper who are, from one cause or another, prevented from the full enjoyment of life and healthy vigour, do not need to be so muscularly strong as I. But they do need health and vitality, and I want them to realise how it is that I am able to place these twin benefits within the reach of at least nine out of ten of the men, women and children who at present do not know exactly all that they imply.

The system I advocate is not—as some people seem to think—one of lifting enormous weights, training with heavy dumb-bells, or performing other feats requiring excessive strength. It consists in practising for a short time every day certain easy, gentle, regular movements, which involve no physical strain, but which, on the contrary, are pleasant to perform. Ladies practise them every day.

A FOOLISH BOGEY.

I am constantly hearing rumours that my system may have a weakening effect on the heart. This bogey is, of course, absolutely absurd. I have proved over and over again that my system, far from weakening the heart, lungs, and the other organs, actually strengthens them, and enables them to perform their proper functions regularly and well, as nothing else can do.

I can cure by my system—I have claimed it before and I now repeat it—almost every case of dyspeptic trouble, nervous breakdown, disorders of the blood, and maladies of the chest and respiratory organs that I undertake.

Write to me. Ask me to send you a copy of my book, "Health Making." It is fully illustrated, and describes a good deal of my methods and the way in which they are applied in different cases of bodily disorders, such as Dyspepsia, Digestive Troubles, Blood Disorders, Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, Spinal Curvature, Nervous Ailments, Chest Maladies, Women's Complaints, etc. It will cost you nothing.

Further, after reading my book, if you can call or if you care to write me any particulars of your own case and desires, I will reply and advise you as to whether I consider you would benefit by my guidance in taking up physical culture, either at one of my institutes or in your own home.

As to the foolish idea abroad that my system entails great expense and takes up a great deal of time. This is absolutely untrue, and if you call upon or write to me at the Sandow Curative Institute, 32a, St. James's Street, London, S.W., you will be able to see for yourself that all I have claimed and have contended for in this article is absolutely borne out by the facts that will then be laid before you, without any obligation to adopt the system unless you wish to do so.—[Advt.]

trimmed with sparkling white chiffon, violets, and Limerick lace; whilst the dresses in Lady MacDonnell's reel were of gold tissue with pale green poplin hems, trimmed with green tulle, Limerick lace, and shamrocks. Such diaphanous costumes hardly suggest any great suitability for reel dancing, do they? But then, as Fred says, it was a reel Lace Ball—"imitation" not being allowed—and that made all the difference. Lord Aberdeen wore a Scotch dress in honour of the occasion—the Gordon tartan—with a scarlet and gold waistcoat, and many magnificent diamond stars of various orders. The taste for dress which men display in stars and ribbons, as in military and official dresses, shows that love of finery and self-adornment is not peculiar to our sex. What masculine wit would be expended supposing a council of Amazons spent all the thought and time over the cut and colour of a head-dress for their corps which the War Office spends with regard to the military cap. "How like women!" the men would exclaim. "How like men!" we well might retort. Some beautiful lace and fine crochet dresses were worn, the latter very exquisite, if perishable, in ball rooms. Lady Massereene's beauty showed to advantage in a lovely old Limerick lace dress over white satin, hemmed with gold tissue. How becoming to a tall slight figure the present fashion of dress is! Lady Fitzgerald also wore beautiful old Limerick lace, as did Ladies Mowbray and Stourton, Holmpatrick, Grace, Stronge, and many others. Lady Grenfell's old Carrickmacross guipure looked beautiful on a black satin dress trimmed with sparkling embroidery and silver. The modern Carrickmacross and Youghal point laces are both very effective and charming for evening dress. The former goes beautifully with satin and diamonds, or pearls. Lady MacDonnell's lovely costume was of silvery crêpe de chine with silver embroidery and exquisite Limerick lace. An ideal dress to go with the soft grey hair which comes prematurely and is so attractive. The Ladies Margaret and Dorothy Lowry-Corry were in white, and Lady Arnott had lovely Irish art needlework and Youghal point lace on a pale blue satin gown. Dancing was kept up to a late hour, and under some overcrowding difficulty at the beginning of the evening.

Lord Dunraven, who has been very active in lending a hand in Irish constitution making of late, has gone to France, where he will meet his daughter on her return from India. He and Lady Aileen Quin will spend some time in Pau. Most things will now be postponed until the Easter holidays are over. What holiday takers we now are, with intervals of work between. A modern transposition.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I present you with some rather "loud" recipes this week, soused herrings and tomatoes, for instance:—

Split and bone 3 or 4 soft roed herrings, take each half and roll it, leaving the tail end outside; place them in a dish, side by side, then screen them lightly with minced shalots; over these arrange slices of tomatoes, and over these minced mushrooms; now place the roes between each fish, and scatter mixed spice here and there; fill up the dish with slightly sweetened vinegar. These can be put in the oven after cooking has been done, and left in all night; remove them before lighting the fire. Garnish them with tufts of chervil, and serve them cold, with half lemons and cayenne.

Creamed eggs with cheese are appetising:—

Cut the whites of 3 hard-boiled eggs into strips, and rub the yolks through a wire sieve. Dissolve an ounce of butter in a stewpan, mix in a spoonful of flour, half a gill of white chicken stock, and half a gill of milk; stir it till it boils, add seasoning, a squeeze of lemon juice, the yolk of an egg, half a gill of cream, and the shredded whites of the eggs. Butter a fireproof gratin dish, put a layer of the creamed whites at the bottom, sprinkle them with cheese, and the passed yolks, add a layer of whites, then the remainder of the cheese and yolks. Mix an ounce of grated cheese with half a gill of cream, pour it on the top, and brown it in the oven.

A pretty sweet for parties:—

Make a fine puff paste, then cut it into strips about an inch in width, a quarter of an inch in thickness, and twelve inches long. Fasten three pieces together at one end with a little beaten egg, then plait them, taking the two outside pieces over the centre one, leaving a space between each fold, fill the hollows with mincemeat, placing the star-shaped piece of paste upon the mincemeat. Set them in a good oven, and when they are done screen the top with minced angelica.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

SUCCESS OF DR. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

In pleasing contrast to the continued failure of Chest Hospitals and Sanatoria to stay the ravages of consumption, the results of Dr. Alabone's treatment stand out prominently, and hundreds of patients and medical men are unceasingly testifying to the great value of this method of cure which has proved successful in innumerable cases which had previously been given up to die.

These statements are amply verified by the letters appended.

To the Editor of the Christian World.

Sir,—I was very glad to see that notice has at length been taken of the treatment of phthisis and tubercular disease by Dr. Alabone's treatment. From personal observation of more than one case which was pronounced "incurable" by well-known consultants, I can bear testimony to the very great relief and total disappearance of the disease.

I maintain that in the public interest the article ought to have appeared in your paper.

It has been solely owing to the petty jealousy of men who ought to be the leaders of science, and who do not hesitate to advertise their names, that the public have not had the benefit of such an inestimable boon long since.

Yours faithfully, J. DAWSON, M.D., L.R.C.S., L.M.

E. Austin, J.P., writes:—I desire to bear testimony to the efficacy of the cure, having had one of my daughters under Dr. Alabone's treatment with most gratifying results. Twelve years ago she was at death's door, and now every sign of weakness and disease has left the lungs, and she is one of the bonniest girls in the North of London.

We would recommend those of our readers who may unfortunately be suffering in Consumption to write to Dr. Alabone for particulars of his treatment, which he has kindly consented to send on application.

* "The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," illustrated by numerous cases "pronounced incurable" by the most eminent physicians; 39th edition, 170th thousand, price 2s. 6d., post free of Author, Edwin W. Alabone, M.D.Phil., D.Sc., ex-M.R.C.S.Eng., Lynton House, Highbury-quadrant, London, N. By the same Author: "Testimonies of Patients, with Comments on the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s.

WONDERFUL NEW DOCTOR.

GREATEST PAIN SPECIALIST OF THE DAY.

FREE PRESCRIPTIONS FOR ONE WEEK.

A famous Paris doctor was lately being sued for the return of the big fee of £4,000 demanded and received by him in advance for an operation (which proved unsuccessful) on an American millionaire's wife.

A striking example of the "no cure no pay" system is the policy adopted in the case of a wonderful new doctor. Thousands of Royal, aristocratic, and other distinguished patients are speaking in the most glowing terms of what they term "a magical pain-soothing and healing touch." No matter whether it be merely a simple headache or the gnawing, aching pain of an acute and chronic disease, relief almost invariably and instantly follows the ministrations of this great new doctor.

This is strong language, but it is backed up by the patronage of well-known people, whose ability to judge cannot be doubted, among them being the following:

MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY.

DISTINGUISHED SOCIAL LEADERS.

The Duke of Abercorn.	Marchioness of Bute.
Lord Ardilaun.	Duchess of Marlborough.

In fact, the whole of this page would not be sufficient to quote the names of Royal, titled, and distinguished people who use this doctor.

This new mechanical doctor (for it is not a flesh and blood physician, but a simple, perfected, non-electric machine called the "Veedee") does not dispense drugs, but administers to the patients thrilling, life-giving, vibratory movement, the very opposite to the congestion and stagnation-caused illnesses that spoil the lives of people in these sedentary modern days.

WHY THERE IS SO MUCH SICKNESS.

How the "Veedee" restores the weak to strength and the sick to health is explained by the inventor in the following notes, which every TRUTH reader who is not in the very best of condition—either really sick or "half-ill"—will profit by reading:

"The whole theory and practice of the 'Veedee'—perfectly true and sure because perfectly natural—is based on this one great truth, that 'There is only one disease—Congestion, and that the cure is to be found in its opposite, i.e., Movement—Movement in its finest and most universal form.'

"The one great, all-comprehending merit of the 'Veedee' is this—that for the first time it makes possible for curative purposes the exact control and precise application of what is perhaps viz., vibration—vibratory massage—or passive exercise. Nature's one greatest law—seen through all her works—is movement and its correlative change. Man's most common mode of living in these modern days may be expressed by the coined word (the very opposite to Nature's intention for him) of 'Sedentariness.' This modern way of life, because it breaks Nature's great law, breeds the whole progeny of human physical ills. The baleful child of 'Sedentariness' is Congestion, and Congestion in some form or other is the mother of nearly every human bodily ill.

"According to the particular part of the individual body which is weakest, so is the particular part or form in which the trouble shows itself. With one it is indigestion, with another Liver, another Kidneys, Rheumatism, Gout, Lung-troubles; with another such nerve troubles as Neuralgia, Lumbago, Sciatica, Neurasthenia, Neuritis; with another a general stodgy feeling (regular or occasional), and growing tendency to obesity. But whatever the local name you call it by, the real cause and true name is the same—Sedentary-produced Congestion, and the remedy, as is always the case, can be sought IN ITS OPPOSITE. The opposite to cold is heat, to darkness light—and the natural way to cure the results of Sedentary-produced Congestion—whatever its location, symptoms, or name, is in the opposite, viz., MOVEMENT.

WHAT THE NEW DOCTOR CAN DO.

"The idea of physical exercise courses was a groping out in the dark after this natural cure. But these were found quite too 'strenuous' for the already sick and weak. Then came the work of the hand-masseur, excellent as far as it went, but expensive and inconvenient, at its very best only applicable to the mere surface of the body. At last, however, comes the 'Veedee' to fill the long-felt want—the machine which is to the efforts of the hand-masseur what the sewing machine is to the hand of the seamstress, or the motor car to the old stage coach. The 'Veedee' deals not with the surfaces only, but thrills right straight through any part or organ of the body (however remote or deep-seated) a stream of tingling, energising force—the very stuff itself that Nature makes life out of—the very essence of exercise, of movement applied just exactly where and when it is needed, with practically no strength-exhausting effort on the part of the patient. The machine does the work, the sufferer gets all the benefit, and the curative or stimulative effect produced is as quick and wonderful as the sensation is delightful.

"One reason why tens of thousands of the 'Veedees' are in daily use is that it STOPS PAIN INSTANTLY.

"It does more than that, though. Applied to the spine it so stimulates the governing nerves as to restore to healthy functional action any defective part or organ of the body."

Thus, briefly, does the inventor indicate how and why the "Veedee" does its healing work. The theory set forth is so obviously true to Nature, and therefore so sure to prove effective, that one is not surprised to learn that 147 "Veedees" were recently sold in one week to doctors alone, that all classes, including Royalty itself, are amongst the "Veedee" users; that during the last eighteen months over 50,000 "Veedees" have been sold, and that they are now being used in every country in the world.

Arrangements have been made to give readers of TRUTH the means to decide if the "Veedee" will help them not merely to be "Middling" well, but to get, and then keep all the time, thoroughly "Fit," hale, and vigorous.

HOW TO GET THE PRESCRIPTION.

Write to the address below, telling what you are suffering from, how you feel, and if you suffer from a painful malady, state exactly where the pain is felt. Your case will then have most careful and expert consideration. If there are reasonable hopes of doing you good, you will at once receive by post, absolutely free, exact details of what ought to be done in your case to get rid of your trouble. This will, of course, place upon you no obligation to carry out what is suggested, but you will be able to consider same, and give yourself the benefit of it, if you sincerely desire to get better. Furthermore, whatever may be necessary to enable you to carry out their recommendation, the "Veedee" proprietors will send on approval with free trial. You will admit that this is one of the fairest offers you have ever seen made.

Letters should be sent at once addressed to Mr. J. E. Garratt, 4, Roycroft House, 96, Southwark-street, London, S.E. Prompt application is recommended, as this offer may not be extended beyond the present week.

SIX GREENING SUCCESSES.

The name GREENING on a Novel signifies that the book is of vital human interest.

MR. HARRIS BURLAND'S NEW ROMANCE.

1. THE GOLD WORSHIPPERS.

By J. B. HARRIS BURLAND, Author of "The Financier," &c. 6/-

Those who enjoyed "The Financier" will not fail to read "The Gold Worshippers," of which The Morning Leader says: "There is the proper thrill in it, and one does not want it to end."

2. FOR THIS CAUSE.

By GEORGE IRVING, Author of "Love." 6/-

"'Tis best to be off with the old love before you are on with the new" is the note of this book.

3. THE OUTER DARKNESS.

By R. H. WRIGHT. 6/-

"When you read in the first chapter the following words: 'I, Martin Sanford, departed this life on 21st Feb., 189—, and was buried—,' curiosity alone compels you to read more."

To quote The Dundee Courier, "the author is to be congratulated in writing at all events, a fanciful and imaginative story on a somewhat novel subject."

4. THE SECOND BLOOM.

BY HELEN V. PORTER. 6/-

This novel is concerned with a descendant of "Bonnie Prince Charlie," and deals with the plots of the later Jacobites. The Daily Express says that "the story is told in a workmanlike manner, and never allows its interest to relax."

5. I WILL REPAY.

A Romance by BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel." 18th Thousand. 6/-

Any work from the pen of the author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel" commands attention, and those who have followed the fortunes of that doughty yet debonair character will hasten to renew the acquaintance in "I Will Repay."

6. DAVRAY'S AFFAIRS.

A Novel by REGINALD TURNER, Author of "The Steeple," &c. 6/-

The author of "Uncle Peaceable" in that book shows his sense of humour, whilst in "Davray's Affairs" he grapples with a novel problem. The Daily Mail says: "Mr. Turner is distinctly advancing his reputation."

GOUT

No Cure—No Pay.

Anturic Bath Salts can and do cure Gout. We have seen this proved in so many thousands of cases that we positively guarantee it to relieve you, or we will refund your money. Anturic Bath Salts act in the natural way. They draw the uric acid out of your system through the pores of the skin. No drugs to take—no dieting necessary—no plasters or liniments required. The warm, pleasant Anturic Bath alone surely and completely rids you of all your pain. Begin to-day. The treatment is quite harmless, and we give you your money back if it fails.

For a mild attack of Gout Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sciatica, or any uric acid disease three or four tins of Anturic Salts should be sufficient. Where, however, the disease is one of long standing, four times this quantity may be required, but a few baths in either case will afford relief. Should no benefit result, send us a certificate to this effect from your medical adviser, also the lids of the tins you have used, together with a receipt from the Chemist from whom they were bought, and we will refund your money.

Remember, no cure—no pay, when you buy

EXTRACTS FROM PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed (inter alia) to acquire by Lease, Concession, Licence, or otherwise, Mines, Mining Rights, or Metalliferous Lands in any part of the world, or any interest therein, and to explore, exercise, develop, and turn to account the same, and particularly in the first instance to acquire two Tin Mines, known as "Sultana" and "Sultana II.," both situate in the neighbourhood of the towns of Ribadavia and Filgueiras, and near to the village of Paolo, in the Province of Orense, Spain.

Mr. E. Wickersheimer, an expert Mining Engineer, who is Chief Engineer in the Department of Mines to the French Government, and a Member of the Conseil du Roseau des Chemins de Fer de l'Etat, made an examination of the above Mines and tested the ore bodies, and has made a report thereon, dated the 5th day of January, 1907, which is in the possession of the Directors, and the following statements are based thereon.

The area of the property is 550 hectares, or thereabouts, and is situated in close proximity to the termini of the Ribadavia and Filgueiras Railway, on the line running to Vigo, a seaport on the Atlantic Ocean, from which port ore can be shipped to England and elsewhere. An estimate of the cost of transport has been made, which shows that the ore can be conveyed from the Mines to London at an inclusive cost of about £2 per ton.

The most valuable part of the business of the Company, having regard to its future, will be the opening up of the Tin lodes, eleven of which have been already located on the left bank of the Arnoya river and five more on the hill of Viso.

The principal Tin lodes on the property are named "San Guillermo," "San Manuel," "San Jaime," "Santa Cristina," "California," "San Francisco" and "San Sebastian."

A considerable amount of work has been carried out on these lodes, some of the levels have been sunk to the extent of 200 mètres or thereabouts.

The mineral is shown in quartz, mispickel and pegmatite containing oxide of tin.

An analysis of the ore taken by Mr. Wickersheimer himself from the Mines was made by Messieurs Morin Frères, of 18, Rue de Montmorancy, Paris, Assayers to the Bank of France, and with the results set out in the above-mentioned report, namely :—

Santa Cristina.—An assay of a portion of the ore extracted from this lode has been made, and has given 24 per cent. of tin oxide, thus showing the existence of rich ore.

San Sebastian.—This lode is very regular, and, although being the least thick of all lodes known on the Mines, it is estimated at about 300,000 tons. An assay has also been made of a portion of the ore extracted therefrom, and the analysis has given a result of over 5 per cent. of tin oxide. Mr. Wickersheimer, in his report, confidently gives his opinion that this lode can be worked with considerable profit to the Company.

San Francisco.—Portions of the ore taken from this lode as now opened have been assayed, and found to contain 1.33 and 8.14 per cent. of tin oxide, and this indicates that at greater depth it will prove a rich lode.

The mispickel which has so far been met with on the principal lodes contains little arsenic and much oxide of tin, forming true lodes rich in tin.

An analysis of the pegmatite has been made, and which produced about 1 per cent. of oxide of tin. Mr. Wickersheimer gives his opinion that there are several millions of tons upon the property, and that the rock, being easily friable, will in itself alone amply justify the Company in exploiting the property, as its contents of oxide of tin, and its friability, make it well paying mineral, the more so as it can be broken into large blocks by pickaxe without the expense entailed in using explosives.

The present market price of tin varies from £190 to £195 per ton.

The Engineer reports that a present production of 1,200 tons per annum of oxide of tin may be obtained from the property, and this should produce about 890 tons of metal at an estimated working cost of £33,600.

Taking the market price of tin at £100 per ton (being only about half the present market value) then 890 tons of fine tin would produce £89,000, which after deduction of the said working cost would leave a net profit of £55,400 per annum. Assuming the net cost of working to remain the same whatever the fluctuation in the market price of the metal, and assuming that the market price of tin was at the price below mentioned, the assumed profits on working the quantity above mentioned would be as follows :—

Taking the market price of tin at £120 per ton, the estimated profit per annum would be £73,200.
At £140 per ton the estimated annual profit would be £91,000.
At £190 per ton the estimated annual profit would be £135,500.

From the above figures supplied by the said Engineer it is reasonable to anticipate that the Company will be able to pay substantial dividends to the Shareholders.

For Contracts and Memorandum of Association see full Prospectus.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Bankers and Brokers, and at the offices of the Company.

Applications for shares must be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers with the amount of the deposit. If no allotment is made the application money will be returned in full, and, where the number of shares allotted is less than that applied for, the balance will be applied towards the payment due on allotment, and any excess returned to the applicant.

SUMMARY OF THE REPORT

Presented at the Fifty-eighth Annual Meeting, held on March 7, 1907.

ORDINARY BRANCH.—The number of Policies issued during the year was 79,942, assuring the sum of £7,529,031, and producing a New Annual Premium Income of £424 145.

The Premiums received during the year were £4,290,971, being an increase of £167 653 over the year 1905.

The Claims of the year amounted to £1,947,444. The number of Deaths was 7,656, and 8,686 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 807,218.

INDUSTRIAL BRANCH.—The Premiums received during the year were £6 499,028, being an increase of £359,978.

The Claims of the year amounted to £2,376,863. The number of Deaths was 260,941, and 3,342 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Free Policies granted during the year to those Policy-holders of five years' standing and upwards who desired to discontinue their payments was 120,198, the number in force being 1,194 432. The number of Free Policies which became Claims during the year was 28 034.

The total number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 16,764,654; their average duration exceeds eleven years.

The Assets of the Company, in both branches, as shown in the Balance Sheet, are £63,887,008, being an increase of £4,422,682 over those of 1905.

The increase granted early in the year under the principal Industrial Branch tables, to provide for which £750,000 was transferred from reserve, affected nearly thirteen million policies, ten millions of which received an immediate increase in the sum assured. The Directors are glad to say that the alteration has been highly appreciated, and has resulted in a large accession of new business.

As the Shareholders are aware, the Directors have on many occasions granted extended benefits to Industrial Branch policy-holders. The total cost of these benefits already exceeds £4,000 000. It is the intention of the Directors to continue this policy, and if possible to establish it upon a more definite basis.

For each of the past ten years a reversionary bonus at the rate of £1 10s. per cent. on the original sums assured has been added to all classes of participating policies in the Ordinary Branch issued since the year 1876. The Directors are now pleased to announce a reversionary bonus at the rate of £1 12s. per cent.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The full Prospectus contains, amongst other things, statements to the following effect:—

This Company has been formed to acquire the undertaking, business, goodwill, leasehold premises, contracts, and rights, and (with the exception of certain Shares in the Dion-Dunlop Motor Company, Limited) the whole of the property of De Dion-Bouton, Limited (a Company registered in England in 1899), who are the exclusive Selling Agents in the United Kingdom and the British Colonies and Dependencies of Cars manufactured by the celebrated French manufacturers, De Dion-Bouton et Cie., and to acquire the well-known "De Dion-Bouton" Patents, relating to road and water traction, namely, No. 22,762 of 1900, 22,763 of 1900, 3,625 of 1902, and 9,551 of 1902 for the United Kingdom; 69,782 of 1901, 71,272 of 1901, 71,729 of 1901, and 71,921 of 1901 for Canada; 2,217 of 1901 for Cape Colony; and 10,657 of 1900, 10,943 of 1901, and 10,944 of 1901 for New South Wales, under which the Company will be able to manufacture Motor-Cars, Omnibuses, Cabs, Delivery Vans, and Motor Vehicles of every description.

The Company is also acquiring the licences in respect of such patents, granted to the Motor Traction Company (1905), Limited, and the Mercedes Daimler and De Dion Motor Company of Great Britain, Limited, and the benefit of certain agreements relating to the importation into this country of 810 omnibuses, or omnibus chassis, manufactured by De Dion-Bouton et Cie.

This Company will thus control in the United Kingdom, and the above-named Colonies and Dependencies, the whole manufacture and sale of Motor Vehicles manufactured under the "De Dion-Bouton" Patents above mentioned, and no such vehicle (unless already licensed) can be imported into or used in such countries without first being licensed by this Company.

This Company will take over unexecuted orders for Motors amounting to over £59,000, and the benefit of orders for Motors executed since the 30th September, 1906, amounting to over £50,000.

In the test trials organised by the Automobile Club of Great Britain and Ireland and the Scottish Automobile Club, and in the test trials held in the Colonies and on the Continent "De Dion-Bouton" Cars have gained an exceptional record for "Excellence of Workmanship," "Reliability," "Durability," and "Hill Climbing."

The Company has secured for a period of seven years the services of Mr. S. F. Edge and Mr. J. W. Stocks, as Chairman and Managing Director respectively. Both these gentlemen have successfully organised and conducted the business of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, and have been connected with extensive and profitable businesses in the Motor Trade.

The profits of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, have been made by the sale of imported "De Dion" Cars, and component parts and accessories thereof, but, having no manufacturing rights, their Car business has been restricted to the sale of such Cars and component parts as they have been able to obtain from De Dion-Bouton et Cie. The business of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, has from its incorporation steadily increased, as will be seen from the following returns of the annual profits (calculated down to September 30 in each year), which have been certified by Messrs. Craig, Gardner, and Harris, Chartered Accountants, who have furnished the Company with the following report:—

20, Copthall-avenue, London, E.C.

To the Directors of

DE DION-BOUTON (1907), LIMITED.

We hereby certify that the profits of De Dion-Bouton, Limited (of which Company we have been Auditors since its Incorporation), not including interest on Investments and on Bank Deposits, have been as follows:—

Period to September 30,	1900..	800	15	5
Year ending "	1901..	4,319	8	8
" " "	1902..	8,017	9	0
" " "	1903..	9,245	13	11
" " "	1904..	11,492	0	11
" " "	1905..	15,136	14	8
" " "	1906..	20,163	16	9

The above profits are arrived at before charging Directors' Fees, Managing Director's Commission, Manager's and Secretary's salaries, and their commissions (which during the year 1906 amounted to £3,608 2s. 6d.), Royalties, and Interest and Expenses on loans, but such profits have been arrived at after allowing for payment of Rent, Rates, and Trade Commissions, and all other expenses incidental to the business.

In the Balance Sheet at 30th September, 1906, the value of the assets of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, after deducting the liabilities as shown by the said Balance Sheet, exceeded the sum of £30,291.

(Signed) CRAIG, GARDNER, AND HARRIS.

25th February, 1907.

As the Company are acquiring under the Agreement No. 5 below mentioned the above patents no royalties will in future be payable by this Company.

Messrs. Edge and Stocks are of opinion that on an annual output of 1,500 Cars being attained a net manufacturing profit of at least £78,500 should be made therefrom.

Taking this estimate as a basis, and adding thereto the estimated profit to be derived from the sale of imported Cars, the profits available for distribution should be at least £80,000, which would enable the Company to pay and leave over £67,000 available for distribution among the Ordinary and Deferred Shares, and for providing for depreciation, reserve, Directors' fees, Manager's and Secretary's salaries and commissions.

7 per cent. on the 185,000 Ordinary Shares £12,950

This issue (when subscribed) will (after payment of the preliminary expenses, estimated at £20,000, which includes underwriting commission and brokerage) provide this Company with a sum in cash of over £96,000, out of which the sum of £2,000 will be paid to S. F. Edge, under Contract No. 5.

The undertaking, business, goodwill, etc., of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, consists of stock-in-trade, sundry debtors, cash in hand and at the bankers, furniture, fittings, plant, and other assets, and these, after deducting the liabilities in carrying on the business as shown by the balance-sheet of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, of the 30th September, 1906, and certified by Messrs. Craig, Gardner, and Harris, as shown in the above report, exceeded £30,291, and this amount will be payable out of the above sum of £96,000. The business of De Dion-Bouton, Limited, will be taken over as from the 30th September, 1906, and the profits will, as from such date, belong to this Company. Messrs. Edge and Stocks have informed the Directors that the assets, after deducting the liabilities, should now exceed the above sum of £30,291.

A brokerage of 6d. per Share in respect of all Shares allotted in response to applications bearing brokers' stamps will be paid by this Company. Brokerage will not be paid in respect of applications sent in in direct relief of underwriting.

The Contracts and Certificate of the Auditors referred to in the full Prospectus and copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of this Company may be inspected at the offices of the Solicitors to the Company, on any day before the closing of the subscription list, between the hours of 11 a.m. and 4 p.m.

The full Prospectus with forms of application can be obtained from the Bankers, Solicitors, or Brokers to the Company.

The Debentures will be issued in pursuance of Article 95 of the Articles of Association of the Buenos Ayres Midland Railway Company, Limited, and a resolution of that Company passed on the 30th day of January, 1907, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st July and 1st January in each year, the first payment falling due on the 1st July, 1907. Interest on the Debentures now offered will be paid upon the instalments from time to time paid up. Upon payment of the last instalment, interest will run upon the full nominal amount of the Debentures. The Debentures may be paid for in full upon application, in which case 3 per cent. interest will be allowed in respect of the amounts paid in advance until the due dates of the respective instalments.

The Debentures which are secured by a Trust-Deed constituting a first charge upon the undertaking of the Railway Company, are to be redeemed on or before the 1st January, 1956, at £110 per cent., and may be redeemed by the Company at its option on six months' notice at any time after the year 1910, at the price of £110 per cent. The amount payable on redemption of the Debentures to be £110 per cent. in any event.

The redemption of the Debentures will be provided for by annual payments by the Railway Company into a sinking fund in the hands of the Trustees, such payments commencing on the 1st January, 1910. The Debentures will be redeemed by annual drawings at £110 per cent., in which case one month's notice of redemption will be given by advertisement, or the sinking fund may be utilised in purchasing Debentures by tender or in the open market whenever they can be acquired at or below the redemption price of £110 per cent.

The £600,000 Debentures now offered for sale have been purchased by the South American Railway Construction Company, Limited (the Contractors), and will be deposited at the Anglo-South American Bank, Limited, to be delivered to the purchasers against payment in full of the fixed price of £92 10s. per cent.

Application will be made to the Stock Exchanges at London, Liverpool and Glasgow for a settlement in and official quotation of the Debentures now offered for sale.

A brokerage of 10/- per cent. will be paid to Brokers in respect of applications for Debentures accepted on forms bearing their names.

Prints of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Railway Company, the Trust Deed securing the Debentures, copies of the Contract and letters, and translations of the Concession and Law referred to within, can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitor to the Contractors, Mr. Cecil Adler, 19 Coleman Street, E.C., whilst the list remains open.

Where any application for Debentures is not accepted the amount paid by way of deposit will be returned in full, and where the amount of Debentures sold to any applicant is less than that applied for, the balance of the amount received in excess of the money payable as deposit will be applied towards the payment due on the acceptance of the application, any excess being returned to the applicant.

Default in payment of any part of the price of the Debentures when due will render the contract to purchase the Debentures liable to cancellation, and the amount previously paid to forfeiture, and any instalments in arrear will carry interest at 5 per cent. per annum.

Applications for the Debentures should be made on the accompanying form and sent to the Anglo-South American Bank, Limited (formerly the Bank of Tarapacá and Argentina, Limited), 97-8 Bishopsgate Street Within, London, E.C., or the Metropolitan Bank (of England and Wales), Limited, 60 Gracechurch Street, London, E.C.

Particulars of Sale and Forms of Application can be obtained from the above-mentioned Bankers and from the Brokers—C. BIRCH CRISP and CO., 11 Angel Court, London, E.C.; DOUGLAS CAIRNEY, 135 Buchanan Street, and Stock Exchange, Glasgow.

Dated 6th March, 1907.

The Buenos Ayres Midland Railway is a metre gauge line of about 333 miles, which has been authorised under a Concession granted by the Provincial Government of Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, to be constructed and worked between Barracas al Sud (a suburb of the City of Buenos Ayres) and Adolfo Alsina (Carhué), the junction of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway and the Buenos Ayres Western Railway. The Concession is owned by the Buenos Ayres Midland Railway Company, Limited (an English Company), and was the first granted by the Provincial Government of Buenos Ayres, after a special Law passed on 6th September, 1904, for the encouragement of railways of this class.

The country through which the line will run is well settled, and is part of the very best for grain production, dairy produce, and the rearing of cattle, sheep, &c. Following the experience in other parts of the province of Buenos Ayres the advent of the new Railway will result in further developing and increasing the cultivation of the land.

Arrangements have been made by which excellent terminal facilities will be obtained, including an entrance into the Great Central Produce Markets at Barracas al Sud (Buenos Ayres), which comprise extensive warehouse, wharf, and other accommodation for the storage and expeditious handling of goods, and which will in effect give this Railway the advantages of a terminal goods station, already built, and an outlet to the River Riachuelo for the export trade. The land for the principal terminal station, apart from the facilities at the Central Produce Markets, covers an area of upwards of 35 acres, and is situate to the south of the City of Buenos Ayres in a rapidly improving business and railway centre.

The line should prove to be of the utmost advantage in the great development and extension which is taking place in the metre gauge Railway system of the Argentine Republic, which at present has its terminus at Rosario, and should ultimately form an important integral part of that great system. The English and French metre gauge lines are now being extended from Rosario to the City of Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Charles Steel, late General Manager of the Great Northern Railway (of England), recently made a special visit to the Argentine to study and advise upon the method of dealing with the traffic of the Railway, and generally to report upon the value and prospects of the line. Mr. Steel completed the arrangements for the acquisition of the Terminal Lands and facilities at Buenos Ayres before referred to. Mr. Oliver Budge, M.Inst.C.E., formerly General Manager of the East Argentine Railway, who has had upwards of 34 years' practical experience of Railway management and construction in the Argentine, and who is one of the Directors of the Buenos Ayres Midland Railway Company, Limited, has also made a careful study and examination of the economic and practical features of the business, and the importance and value of the Line. Mr. Budge is now at Buenos Ayres, where he has been for the last few months supervising the construction of the line on behalf of the Railway Company.

The definite surveys of the Line were completed and plans approved by the Provincial Government in accordance with the provisions of the Concession, and the work of construction was formally commenced on the 8th June, 1906, and is now proceeding. It is anticipated that the first 25 kilometres of the Line from Barracas al Sud (Buenos Ayres) will be completed very shortly, and work on other parts of the Line has also been commenced so that the progress of the remainder of the works will rapidly proceed.

A REMARKABLE BOOK ON THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., the distinguished authority on Hygienic Science and Health Questions, is evidently a believer in Thomas Carlyle's doctrine that there is no utility in pointing out misfortunes unless you at the same time indicate the remedy. In his remarkable little book, "The Art of Living," just issued from the press, Dr. Wilson not only points out that "Our first duty to ourselves is to check illness at the outset," but he follows up this admonition with the more welcome information how we are to do it. He, so to speak, says: "You have the evil of ill-health to fight. Now, here's the weapon to fight with. Strike for freedom." For example, he says: "Suppose a person has run down—feels languid and is easily tired. If he neglects this warning—for all such signs and symptoms are Nature's warning to us—the possibility is that he will pass further afield into the great lone land of disease. Can he do anything to save himself from such a disastrous result? In the vast majority of cases he can restore his vigour." How? Dr. Wilson tells his reader how without delay, adding at once this remarkable statement: "Probably he will be advised to take a tonic. This in the main is good advice. Unfortunately the number of tonics is legion, but if there exists any preparation which can combine in itself the properties of a tonic and restorative, and which at the same time can contribute to the nourishment and building up of the enfeebled body, it is evident such an agent must prove of the utmost value to everybody. I have found such a tonic and restorative in the preparation known as Sanatogen." How the distinguished author found this tonic he tells us in an interesting bit of autobiography. "Recovering from an attack of Influenza," he says, "and suffering from the severe weakness incidental to that ailment, Sanatogen was brought under my notice. I gave it a fair trial, and the results were all that could have been desired. In a short time my appetite improved, the weakness was conquered, and without the use of any other medicine or preparation I was restored to health." It is easy to believe that this experience led the doctor to make a thorough investigation into this specific which had served him so well. Sanatogen, he tells us, "combines two distinct elements, one tonic and the other nutritive." Further, it is no "secret" remedy, for, as he pertinently observes: "Its composition is well known, otherwise medical men would not prescribe it." What the tonic and nutritive elements of Sanatogen are and how they effect so much good Dr. Wilson describes in simple, convincing terms. The whole passage is too long to quote, but one important remark of the writer may be given, namely, that one of the principal elements of Sanatogen "represents the substance which actually forms a very important, if not the most important, constituent of our brain and nervous system." How, through regenerating the nervous system, Sanatogen restores the functions of the digestive organs, and by rebuilding the tissues compensates the wear and tear of latter-day life; how it does away with the need of stimulants, and cures the sick by the natural method of making the body strong enough to drive out disease—all this, in the delightful style of Dr. Wilson's language, makes engrossing and pleasant as well as instructive reading. This last contribution of Dr. Wilson to the literature of Health may certainly be calculated to carry joyful news to the ailing and weary. A limited number of complete specimen copies of the "Art of Living," by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., are being distributed free of charge. To obtain one of these copies the applicant must mention "TRUTH" in sending his name and address to the Publishers—F. WILLIAMS & Co., 83, Upper Thames St., London, E.C.

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S-GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,468.

Most of my readers, I suppose, are acquainted with the good old riddle: "If you saw a house on fire, what appropriate commentary could you make upon it, using the surnames of three distinguished literary persons?" of which the answer is "Dickens, Howitt, Burns."

Now I think that the idea contained in the above riddle might be developed and amplified into an interesting and instructive Puzzle.

I am, therefore, offering this week the usual Prize of Two Guineas for the best original example of:—

A SHORT PARAGRAPH IN INTELLIGIBLE ENGLISH, OF NOT MORE THAN FIFTY WORDS, INTO WHICH SHALL BE INTRODUCED THE GREATEST NUMBER OF SURNAMES OF DISTINGUISHED LITERARY CHARACTERS.

I need hardly point out that such surnames must not be introduced as proper names, but as ordinary English words, or parts of words.

But, in order to facilitate the efforts of solvers, exact similarity in spelling will not be de rigueur, provided that exact similarity of sound is produced. Thus, e.g., 'Moore' will be accepted as the equivalent of 'moor,' Scott of 'Scot,' Cowper' of 'cooper,' and so on.

Competitors will be required to underline, in every case, the surnames introduced and to write, at the foot of their solutions, the number of such names which they claim to have embodied.

The 'distinguished literary characters' may belong to any age, language, or nationality from the earliest times down to the present day. They must, however, be 'distinguished' and well-known names.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No competitor must send in more than one paragraph.

(ii) All paragraphs must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, March 25th, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The real name, with the address, of BLENCATHRA, winner of TRUTH Prize No. 1457, is Mrs. Nixon, 9, Rye Hill Park, Peckham Rye.

ELDIBEE.—I duly note your correction, for which many thanks.

DUDHOPE.—Your new address is duly noted.

CHICK.—A hearty welcome to you.

ECHO and ZIMMY.—Very pleased to renew acquaintance with you.

A WORD TO COMPETITORS:

I should be glad, if in future, all Competitors would avoid writing extraneous matter on the sheets of paper containing their solutions, merely putting the number of the Puzzle at the head of their solutions and their noms-de-plume at the foot.

Anything in the nature of correspondence, or of explanatory remarks, should be written on a separate sheet of paper, also signed with nom-de-plume for identification. Only new competitors are required to add their real names and addresses.

Competitors will save both the Printers and myself an endless amount of trouble by complying with these conditions.

New

for the 1907 Spring Season

It is by originating designs and colourings that are pre-eminent for refinement and distinction that Hamptons still hold their long-established reputation as the World's Leading House for Tasteful Carpets.

500 exclusive designs, every one of which is conspicuously interesting and provides strikingly distinguished effects,

thus affording to the cultured purchaser an infinitely more attractive assortment than any number of commonplace productions manufactured for the general market.

Although the effects afforded by many of Hamptons exclusive Carpets are incomparably superior to those of the goods on sale throughout the trade, yet the prices remain the lowest in London.

Every reader who requires new Carpets should, therefore, not fail to call and view Hamptons new productions for 1907 now on sale in their Showrooms, or write at once for their Book of Floor Coverings, E224, Illustrated in Colours, now ready, post free.

Hamptons will gladly send a selection of their new Carpets to the House of any responsible applicant.

ARE YOU TAKING

an everyday care of yourself? Prevention you know is ever so much better than cure. A little irregularity of the stomach seems such a trivial thing to-day, but next week it is a malady, ever getting more serious: little ailments soon become big complaints. Cure that little irregularity at once. Neglect it, and it leads swiftly to dyspepsia, indigestion, flatulence, constipation, biliousness, headache, and perhaps a train of greater evils. Even these will yield to but why run the risk of so much suffering? What folly to delay—waiting till one is ill.

A dose of these famous pills taken whenever the least weariness is experienced will effectually prevent any unpleasant developments. Don't wait till you have to be cured. Take an everyday care of yourself, remember always if you keep the bowels regular and the liver in working order you will never be troubled with indigestion and it's attendant miseries.

"Taking care" of course means that the standard remedy must be always at hand. In many thousands of homes BEECHAM'S PILLS are regarded as the family medicine and are kept in an appointed place always ready for use. When you notice a symptom you want to get rid of it at once: there is no time like the present. To be always prepared, you too, must keep a box of Beecham's Pills

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1577. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, March 20, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE third Court of the season will be held by the King and Queen in the ballroom of Buckingham Palace early in May, probably on either Friday, the 3rd, or Friday, the 10th. It is understood that the fourth Court will be held after the Whitsuntide holidays and before their Majesties go to Windsor for Ascot race week. Friday, June 7, is the date "mentioned" for this function. It is not expected that a fifth Court will be held this season.

At the Council which was held by the King at Buckingham Palace on the 1st of this month, the King signified his approval of an Order in Council that the Long Vacation shall in future begin on August 1 and terminate on October 12.

It is now expected that the Empress Marie will either return direct to St. Petersburg when she leaves London, or that she will proceed to Copenhagen on a short visit to the King and Queen of Denmark before going back to Russia.

The Queen has abandoned her intention of proceeding by sea to Gibraltar and thence to Marseilles, and will revert to her original plan of leaving London on April 1 or 2 for Marseilles, where she will be met next day by the King, who is to arrive there shortly before her Majesty from Biarritz. The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert has left Portsmouth for Gibraltar, and proceeds thence to Marseilles to embark the King and Queen and Princess Victoria, who will accompany her Majesty. The Royal yacht is to leave Marseilles directly after the King and Queen have joined her on a Mediterranean cruise, which will extend over three weeks, and which will probably terminate at Venice.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught are to spend a few days in Egypt at the beginning of next month, when on their homeward journey from India. The Duke will present new colours to the Dublin Fusiliers at Alexandria.

Several of the daily papers published a telegram last week announcing that the King of Spain's intended visit to Biarritz had been given up, and that when the King leaves Marseilles in the Royal yacht at the beginning of next month he will proceed to Carthagena, and thence to Madrid. These statements are pure and simple inventions. There never was any idea of King Alfonso visiting Biarritz. As to his Majesty's contemplated visit to Madrid, it was decided quite two months ago that the trip should be postponed for a year, as was announced in Truth several weeks back.

The Crown Prince and the Crown Princess of Roumania will pay a visit to England during the summer, and they will probably be included in their Majesties' house party at Windsor Castle during Ascot race week.

Queen Caroline of Saxony (widow of King Albert) has arrived at Brussels, on a visit to the Comtesse de Flandre, from Berlin en route from Dresden. It is expected that Queen Caroline will pay a visit to England before she returns to Germany. It will be remembered that she spent a short time in London in May, 1905, when she was received with marked attention by the King. Queen Caroline then intimated that she would be pleased to receive a visit from his Majesty, or the Prince of Wales, or the Duke of Connaught, at Sybillenort, her beautiful domain in Silesia, which is one of the best hunting estates in North Germany. Sybillenort was left to King Albert by the late Duke of Brunswick.

Princess Louise and the Duke of Argyll have been staying at Kent House, their residence on the Osborne estate, where Princess Louis of Battenberg has been on a visit to them. They returned at the end of last week to Kensington Palace. Princess Louise is going abroad for a short time, and the Duke of Argyll will spend the Easter holidays in Scotland.

"UNEASY LIES THE HEAD THAT WEARS A (SERVIAN) CROWN."

Achilles vowed he'd rather toil
(So we've in Homer read)
A hireling labourer on the soil
Than reign among the dead.

E'en thus King Peter, if he'd tell
The truth, would doubtless own
He'd rather run a cheap hotel
Than sit on Servia's throne.

The Dublin Castle season came to an end last week, terminating with the St. Patrick's Ball on Friday, and the State dinner, also in honour of the national saint, on Saturday. The last-named entertainment is not, like the former, of old standing, but dates from the period when the shamrock, as a sympathetic concession to Irish feeling, was taken into favour at Court. At the State dinner on Saturday the guests numbered several hundreds, the leading officials and personages, with their wives, all in full Court dress. The banquet was celebrated in the Scotch Gaelic fashion, the Lord-Lieutenant presiding in St. Patrick's Hall, in Highland dress. The table was in the form of St. Andrew's cross, and pipers discoursed music throughout the dinner.

The picturesque ceremony of trooping the colour in the Upper Castle Yard took place on Saturday morning. The chief part in the military pageant was taken by the Royal Irish Fusiliers. There was much wearing of the green, and the bands played selections of Irish music. Lord Grenfell and his staff, and the leading military officials, were present. The Lord-Lieutenant and a large Viceregal party, all displaying bunches of shamrock, witnessed the ceremony from the balcony outside the Throne-room in the Castle. The weather was most unfavourable in its wildness to an out-of-doors pageant, storm alternating with heavy showers.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen leave Dublin Castle for the Viceregal Lodge this week, unless, which is not anticipated, Lady Aberdeen's recovery should not be complete enough for the move. The Viceregal residence in the Phœnix Park enjoys at all seasons, and especially in the spring, a more than adequate supply of fresh air and breezes. Most of the official residents in the Castle yards usually take flight, also, when the "season" is over. The week after Easter, however, will see a reassembling of Society in Dublin, Punchestown races taking place this year on the 9th and 10th of April—earlier dates than usual—and the Leopardstown race meeting on the 12th and 13th of the same month.

Lord Penrhyn was the son of Colonel Douglas, a younger brother of the nineteenth Earl of Morton, who married the elder daughter and heiress of Mr. George Dawkins Pennant, of Penrhyn Castle, the head of one of the oldest families in Wales. The Penrhyn estates extend over nearly 47,000 acres, and the quarries are said to yield a net profit of about £60,000 a year when trade is brisk. Lord Penrhyn's first wife was a daughter of the late Sir Charles Rushout, and his second wife was the daughter of the Rev. Henry Glynne, rector of Hawarden, and niece of Mrs. W. E. Gladstone. Lord Penrhyn came into possession of his estates in 1886, when he succeeded his father, who had been raised to the peerage by Lord Derby in 1866.

Lord Penrhyn had inherited a full share of the despotic tendencies of the Douglas family, which had been increased by the circumstances of his early life and by his social surroundings. He was a man of remarkably strong character; austere and imperious in manner, and arbitrary in his methods, but he was really most kind hearted. He was a most ardent supporter of the principle of freedom of contract, and he keenly resented dictation from any quarter; but he was an hereditary Tory of the old school and a staunch Churchman, and he certainly liked to dictate to the clergy on his estates, apparently regarding them as so many domestic chaplains of the tame cat order. He was an excellent man of business, and had a great capacity for both organisation and administration. He took an active and very useful part in all the affairs of North Wales, where he will be much missed. He was a fine shot, a most expert angler, and an admirable and resolute rider to hounds. In South Northamptonshire, where he owned a large estate, he was popular, and as Master of the Grafton Hunt he made himself greatly liked by the farmers of that country. For eight years he hunted that country at his own expense. Lord Penrhyn was known to many of his friends as Don Quixote, whose portraits he considerably resembled in appearance.

Penrhyn Castle is an immense and very stately house, with some remarkably fine rooms, but it is gloomy, being built of grey stone. The windows command most beautiful views over the sea and mountains, and much of the surrounding scenery is very grand. Penrhyn has been a most hospitable house during the reign of the late owner, and it was rendered the more pleasant by a genial and charming family, and a perfect hostess, who was once described by a well-known guest as "presiding over this great place with the calm of perpetual moonlight."

Sir James Colquhoun, of Luss, who died suddenly at Hastings on Thursday, was chief of the Clan Colquhoun, and he owned large estates in Dumbartonshire. Rossdhu, his family seat on the western shores of Loch Lomond, is a very beautiful place. Sir James succeeded to the baronetcy and estates in December, 1873, when his father was drowned in Loch Lomond, through the overturning of a boat laden with dead deer, which he had shot on one of the islands. Sir James succeeded the late Mr. Crum Ewing, of Strathleven, as Lord Lieutenant of Dumbartonshire in 1887, on the nomination of Lord Salisbury. He was very popular in the county, and took a keen interest in all local affairs. He was a generous and considerate landlord, and his property round Helensburg had greatly increased in value during his ownership. The estates have long been under trust, so that the late owner's powers were limited. The baronetcy passes to his cousin, Colonel Colquhoun, who is a son of Mr. John Colquhoun, the author of "The Moor and the Loch."

The late baronet's father, Sir James Colquhoun, was notable in Scotland for his Liberal politics, which were not then often professed by the territorial magnates of the north. He was very advanced in his views, except on the Game Laws, as to which he was a Tory of Tories, and he would have punished poaching and similar offences with Draconian severity. Sir James represented Dumbartonshire in Parliament for many years. He was a keen sportsman and a famous shot.

In referring last week to the late Sir Francis Barry's annual anonymous donation of 11,000 sixpences to the children in the London Poor Law institutions, I inadvertently stated that the donation was accompanied by a cheque for £5 to relieve the TRUTH Toy Fund of the cost of distributing the money. More people than I have time to count have written to tell me that in that case I must have known from the signature of the cheque who sent the money. I may remark that this does not necessarily follow, since a bank might have drawn the cheque. In point of fact, however, what Sir Francis Barry sent was always a five-pound note, and my statement that it was a cheque was due to pure carelessness. I am glad, however, of the mistake, for it has shown once again how many clever people I number among my readers, and how attentively they read their TRUTH.

Visitors to Switzerland at this time of year are apt to have very unpleasant experiences of Swiss law in the event of their contracting infectious disease. A typical example of this has just occurred. A young lady who was staying at an hotel-pension in Montreux was attacked with scarlet fever, and had to be removed to a sanatorium. On the top of all the other trouble and expense incurred, the proprietor of the pension raised a claim for £40 as an "indemnité," and seized the luggage, clothing, and jewellery of the young lady and her mother pending the settlement of the claim in the law courts. Swiss law entitles an hotel keeper to compensation under such circumstances, but, considering the probability that the disease is contracted inside the establishment rather than outside, it would seem that the customer has, primâ facie, quite as good a claim to compensation.

Although the sanatorium to which the patient is compulsorily removed under such circumstances as the foregoing is a public institution, the charges are £7 a week, irrespective of medical fees and the cost of disinfecting the place from which the patient is removed. In this state of things, it would seem worth while for visitors to Switzerland at the time of year when infectious disease is about to try to come to some understanding beforehand as to what they will be liable for in the event of their catching anything unpleasant. After all, hotel accommodation is as a rule cheaper and better in Switzerland than anywhere else in the world, and I should think the better class of hotel-keepers will not be found very stubborn in standing on their rights when their visitors are in trouble.

Is the increase of holiday-making at Easter the cause or the effect of the growing enterprise of the railway companies? Perhaps it is a little of both. Londoners certainly have become more and more alive to the benefits, both to body and mind, of a change of air and scene, a taste of the delights of springtime in the country or an invigorating sojourn at the seaside, after a long winter in town. It is equally clear that the railway companies have fostered and stimulated this feeling by the attractiveness of the arrangements they make. Each Easter they vie with one another in the compilation of the most alluring programmes. The Great Northern tempts the holiday-maker to Scotland, or, if that be too long a journey—though it can be performed in the greatest comfort—it will take him to the Norfolk or Lincolnshire coast or to Yorkshire or Lancashire. Even those who can only get away for a day or a half-day have an abundance of choice of excursions. Then there are the Midland and the North-Western, with their offers of cheap tickets to innumerable inland and seaside resorts; and the South-Western, with its invitations to the English Sunny South, "the best for an early Easter." As for an Easter in Paris, the South-Eastern is at your service, and the Brighton Company, too. In all directions, in fact, the railway companies nowadays offer the Easter holiday-maker wonderfully improved facilities for getting away for a few days or a week or longer.

In my paragraph last week on the Devon and Somerset Staghounds I mentioned that in consequence of hinds in calf being hunted, one landowner has forbidden the Hunt to come on his estate. I now find that the prohibition only comes into force at a certain date each season, and that the gentleman imposing it is himself a stag-hunter of many years' standing, and a member of the Hunt Committee. These facts greatly accentuate the force of his protest against the barbarous cruelty of hind-hunting at this period of the year; and it is much to be regretted that his colleagues on the Committee do not put an end to a practice so discreditable to the sport.

COMFORTABLE COUNTRY HOUSE.—Vacancy for one or two ladies to be trained in Domestic Economy, Cooking, Dressmaking, etc.; Riding, Driving, Outdoor Games. Excellent references.—MRS. GODDARD, Water Stratford, Buckingham.

AN ECHO OF THE BOAT RACE.

A daily paper takes the view
We give importance more than due
To rowing;
And says, in after life's stern stress
'Tis brains, not thews, that are success
Bestowing.

If brains per se success could spell,
This argument were very well,
I own, Sir;
But all who think the matter o'er
Must see that brains won't victory score Alone, Sir.

A body temperate, healthy, clean,
Its appetites and passions keen Restraining,
And pluck and grit, these help to earn
Success in life, and these lads learn
In training.

So while our young men's minds we feed

In reference to what was said in last week's Truth upon certain observations on the subject of bearing-reins attributed to Lady Orford, her ladyship writes that she was not quite correctly reported, and that all she said in regard to what the reporter called "Court carriages" was that where horses have to face great crowds and noise, the use of a bearing-rein, as giving greater control over the animal, is perhaps excusable. She did not, therefore, suggest that precautions may be taken for the safety of the lives of Royal personages which would not be admissible for those of humbler rank. Lady Orford also points out that if a horse, in the course of its work, is kept standing for a long time under a tight bearing-rein, as outside Burlington House, it must be under great discomfort, and that any temporary relaxation must be of advantage to it, and in this I dare say she is right.

Extraordinary prices were paid last week at Christie and Manson's at the sale of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's splendid collection of engravings, which realised nearly £19,300, or more than double the sum at which it had been previously valued. "Lady Jane Halliday," by Valentine Green, after Reynolds, was run up to £820, the highest price previously paid for this engraving having been £472 at the Normanton sale six years ago. Green's "Lady Louisa Manners," after Reynolds, sold for £670, the highest price previously paid having been £141. A superb impression of Rembrandt's "Three Trees" fetched £620. The highest price hitherto recorded for this etching is £385.

Although the contest for the Chancellorship at Oxford resolved itself at the poll more or less into a party fight, it did not originate in any party, still less personal, feeling against Lord Curzon or for Lord Rosebery. Unionist members of Convocation took an active part in promoting the contest. The opposition to Lord Curzon was inspired by the impression that an attempt was being made to "wire-pull" the election in the interest of All Souls'. Further measures of University reform are in the air, and there is a strong feeling in Oxford—outside All Souls', of course—that All Souls' is the institution to which reform should be first applied whenever it comes. Consequently, anything which looks like a tactical operation to defend the interests of that college in the selection of a Chancellor is calculated to excite suspicion. Justly or not, the part taken by the Warden of All Souls' in the selection of a candidate stimulated that suspicion. A little incident which arose out of the meeting at Magdalen helped in the same direction. What was considered a misleading account of the meeting appeared in the Times. Two members of Convocation sent a correction to that paper. It was not published. The Editor of the Times, like Lord Curzon, has held an All Souls' fellowship. The circumstance, therefore, might have a little significance of its own.

From what I know of Lord Curzon, I should not suppose that, even if the opportunity arose, he is at all likely to justify either the misgivings of his opponents or the motives which have been, rightly or wrongly, attributed to his backers. No doubt, as Chancellor, he will look to the interests of the University at large rather than those of any individual college, if the two happen to come into conflict. But the anti-All Souls' and pro-All Souls' element in the late contest has an interest which makes it worth recording. Outside the College itself there cannot be any question that All Souls' is a very anomalous institution. Its continued existence in its present shape is quite indefensible; and that there is a strong feeling to this effect in Oxford, and that a good many Conservatives hold it strongly, is a fact to be remembered when University reform is next taken in hand.

Until last week there had not been a contested election for the Chancellorship of Oxford University since 1809, when there was a most sensational contest, and Lord Grenville, the "Liberal" candidate, unexpectedly defeated Lord Eldon, then Lord Chancellor, who would have won the coveted office but for the fact that a second Tory candidate was brought forward in the person of the Duke of Beaufort, who was better known as an enthusiastic foxhunter than as a scholar. Political affairs were then very unsettled, but Lord Eldon would certainly have been successful if the electors could have foreseen that he would occupy the woolsack, and dispense its patronage, for another eighteen years.

The last contest at Cambridge took place in 1847, after the death of Hugh, Duke of Northumberland (who was often described as "an excellent man, but the greatest bore that ever lived"), when Prince Albert defeated Lord Powis, who was the Conservative and High Church candidate. This contest caused much ill-feeling, both in the University and out of it, and years elapsed before there was an end of the bitterness and exasperation which had been excited. Dr. Whewell, the Master of Trinity, was the most active and zealous of the resident dons on the side of Prince Albert.

The election of the Rev. H. E. D. Blakiston as President of Trinity, Oxford, was pretty generally expected and has been received with satisfaction both in the College and in the University. Mr. Blakiston has been a Fellow of Trinity for twenty years, a tutor since 1890, and senior tutor since 1889. He has filled numerous University offices, including those of proctor and examiner, and he is still one of the auditors of University accounts. The University offices held by the late President have also now been filled up by Congregation. Mr. Smith, of Balliol, was elected Curator of the Bodleian by a large majority over Mr. Oman, Chichele Professor of Modern History. For the Curatorship of the Parks Mr. Somerville (Sibthorpian Professor of Rural Economy) defeated Mr. Shields, Fellow of Corpus.

The Prime Minister has made an excellent appointment to the stall in Canterbury Cathedral which became vacant by the death of Canon F. J. Holland, the senior member of the Chapter. Prebendary Stuart has been for over a quarter of a century one of the most zealous and popular leaders of the Evangelical party, and he has held large London parishes with conspicuous success, having been untiring in his pastoral work. He is an admirable preacher, and has gained a high reputation as a missioner. Although he has always been an Evangelical champion, he is no partisan, and has at various times worked cordially with men from whom he differs widely. He succeeded the Bishop of Ripon as Vicar of St. James's, Holloway, in 1879, and in 1893 he became Vicar of St. Matthew's, Bayswater. The present Bishop of London collated him to a prebendal stall in St. Paul's Cathedral about two years ago. He was captain of the Harrow eleven, and boat-club captain at St. John's College, Cambridge.

Prebendary Stuart will still be able to devote himself largely to the mission work which he has carried on so successfully, as there are six residentiary Canons at Canterbury, so that he will be on duty there for only two months in the year. The stall was formerly worth £1,000 a year, but agricultural depression has reduced the income of the Chapter, and the stipend does not now exceed £700, with a very nice house and garden in the precincts.

Prebendary Kempe, who died last week at the age of ninety-seven, was for many years one of the most prominent and influential of the London clergy, and for over forty years he was Vicar of St. James's, Piccadilly, having been presented to that important living in 1853 by Lord Aberdeen, on the promotion of Dr. Jackson to the See of Lincoln, after the death of Bishop Kaye. Mr. Kempe had for many years the richest and most aristocratic congregation in London, the pews being then occupied every Sunday during the season by princes, peers, bishops, and members of the House of Commons, and social and literary celebrities. He was able to raise very large sums without any trouble whatever. It was an old rule of the vestry that all the most prominent pews were to be let only to "parishioners of title and distinction." Lord Derby, the Minister, was a regular attendant on Sunday mornings, and sat in a front gallery pew, immediately above the pulpit.

The late Prebendary, who was a High Churchman of the good old school, was the first Vicar of St. James's to preach in a surplice, and his repudiation of the Geneva gown excited some dissatisfaction in the parish during the first few weeks of his incumbency, but his many excellent qualities soon reconciled the congregation to this change. He was a large-minded man with wide sympathies, and he was ready to give practical assistance to every good work. For many years Kempe was looked upon as a future Bishop, and if he had been more of a "pusher" he would no doubt have attained to the Episcopal Bench, a promotion which would probably have shortened his life considerably. His only preferment was a prebendal stall in St. Paul's Cathedral, which was given to him in 1861 by Archbishop Tait, who was then Bishop of London. He was a chaplain to Queen Victoria for thirty-seven years.

Mr. Kempe was a genial and courteous divine, with the fine manners of the old school. Some years ago he wrote a little volume of reminiscences, which was printed for private circulation only. He was a noted scholar, and he had a great store of interesting recollections of the many celebrated people with whom he had been brought into intimate contact. Mr. Kempe commenced his clerical career as curate of Tavistock, after he had been ordained by Bishop Henry Phillpotts in 1833, and he stayed there for three years. He resided at Cambridge as Fellow of Clare College from 1838 until his marriage in 1842.

"Surely this is a novel form of temperance work," writes a lady in Willesden, who has been favoured with the following announcement. Very novel, I should say. The "Escaped Nun" in question is a notorious person, and the discourses of such persons have no relation to the cause of temperance or any other virtue. The intimation "Ladies only" suggests much, and among other things that the term "lady"

A firm who had for some years kept a collecting-box for the Poor Children's Society on their counter, having seen the mention of this concern in the Truth Cautionary List, wrote to request that the box should be removed. In replying, Mr. G. H. Breton, the "founder and director," writes:—

If you should be in London any Wednesday or Friday, between 12 and 1 p.m., and see 1,000 children being fed at dinner, November to Easter, at our headquarters, I think you would alter your opinion as stated, or call at our homes at Southend-on-Sea during the summer months.

I neither control nor manage the society. This is done by a committee, who have all management of funds and banking account, with a financial secretary, who receives and pays out money according to their instructions, and has done so for many years.

This is a good example of the sort of reply that a charity-monger of this type always has ready for criticism of his finances and management. No one has ever denied that Breton feeds a certain number of poor children at his headquarters, or that he keeps others in his homes at Southend. The question is whether the work done bears any adequate proportion to the vast amount of money collected, and to this question the accounts which the so-called society has published afford a sufficient answer. As to the committee, the question is who are its members, and by whom are they appointed? When I last had occasion to go into the matter, they contained a handsome proportion of relatives and hangers-on of the Breton family, and if they have been appointed by any other authority than that of Mr. and Mrs. Breton, it may be taken for granted that the fact would have been stated.

The best proof of the real character of the alleged committee is that within the last three or four years at least two independent gentlemen who have joined it in the hope of putting the administration on a proper footing, have eventually retired from the task in despair. Two of these gentlemen subsequently reported to me their experience of the committee and the society, and of the position occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Breton in relation to the business. On the other hand, although Breton is ready to throw dust in the eyes of a casual objector by a letter like the above, he has never, from the first moment that his charity was criticised in Truth, made the slightest attempt to answer what has been said about the concern, and the legitimate inference from this is that he knows it to be unanswerable. It is a great pity that the hundreds of tradespeople in London and throughout the Home Counties who keep Breton's collecting-boxes on their counters do not follow the example of the firm above mentioned.

In pleasant contrast to this shady charity of Mr. Breton's, my attention has been called during the past week to two excellent institutions of the same class at work in provincial towns. One is the Preston Borough Police Poor Children's Fund. As its name implies, this fund is run under the auspices of the police, and its report is issued by Major Little, the Chief Constable of Preston, and trustee of the fund. It keeps up a seaside convalescent home for poor children at St. Anne's, in which 320 children were kept for about three weeks each last year at a cost of £270 18s. 2d.—a figure which may be profitably compared with Breton's expenditure—and it did other work, no less economically, in the shape of treats in summer and winter, the distribution of clothing, shoes, clogs, and gifts to other funds; all this without a penny of expenditure on officials or collectors.

The other charity just referred to is also located in Lancashire—the Poor Children's Treat Association, of Wigan. This also is a fund managed by the police, the Chief Constable of Wigan being the honorary secretary. Like the Preston fund, it has no administrative expenses, and its work is similar, except that it keeps up no home, but distributes practically the whole of its income in treats, food, clothing, and clogs—the last useful item accounting for no less than £148. It would seem that for the juvenile population of Preston and Wigan nothing can be more desirable than to fall into the hands of the police, and the example of these towns seems well worthy of imitation.

The institution formerly known as the Queen's Jubilee Hospital has incurred in past years so much unfavourable notice in Truth and elsewhere, that it is satisfactory to know that it has been very thoroughly re-organised, and with very good results. The hospital is now known as the Kensington General Hospital. It has Lord Brassey for its President, a representative and influential committee of management, and a first-rate medical staff; and the report for 1906, which has just been issued, shows that it is doing much good work in all departments.

The report records the retirement of Mr. R. F. Benham owing to ill-health. I have no desire to say anything here as to the history of Mr. Benham's connection with the old Jubilee Hospital. But it would be affectation to dissemble the fact that, in view of what has happened in the past, the institution was prejudiced by Mr. Benham's association with it, and his retirement makes it easier to commend the charity to the support of the public. It has always been a strong point in favour of the institution that it is the only general hospital available for a very poor and populous district of London. It actually received 14,465 out-patients and 306 in-patients last year, and every one must desire that it should be placed in a position to deal adequately and efficiently with the heavy calls upon its resources.

It has been suggested to me that in the preparation of his scheme for the Territorial Force, Mr. Haldane may have been, consciously or unconsciously, inspired in some measure by one put forward some three years ago by the late Mr. John R. Hutchinson, of Leamington. Mr. Hutchinson's idea has more than once been referred to in TRUTH, though his name was not mentioned, and some of my readers may remember it when I say that the cardinal feature in it was the raising of the whole army by the civil local authorities, and the payment of the men out of the rates, the object being to obtain a certain quota of men from each district, and to penalise the district by the extra pay that would have to be given to recruits if men failed to offer themselves voluntarily in the required numbers.

Mr. Haldane's scheme applies the principle of recruiting by a civil authority to the second line, and almost literally follows another suggestion of Mr. Hutchinson's, namely, that the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers should be absorbed in a new force for which he actually suggested the name "Territorial Army." This, of course, may be mere coincidence. But besides the notice that it has received in TRUTH, Mr. Hutchinson's scheme was amplified in an essay sent to the United Service Institution in 1905, and I am told by one of his relatives that he submitted his ideas to the War Office, so that it is possible that he really sowed seed which has now borne fruit. However this may be, he is entitled to the honour of having anticipated Mr. Haldane in certain important points—though, unhappily, it is only a posthumous honour.

I have received the following from a Service correspondent, and as far as I can ascertain he is correct as to the facts, which certainly justify unfavourable observation:—

There is a good deal of dissatisfaction in India over the manner in which appointments as aide-de-camp to the King have recently been made. Hitherto a strict and impartial system of marking has insured that the colonel or lieutenant-colonel with the most distinguished service should succeed to the vacancy. This rule was over-ridden by Lord Kitchener, who, instead of taking the most distinguished officer, sent in the name of his own Military Secretary, a comparatively junior officer, who had no possible claim to supersede his seniors. Though it was a disappointment to the Indian Army feeling that Lord Kitchener should take a step of this kind, it was never dreamt that the departure from the established practice was more than temporary. It was confidently expected that when the next vacancy occurred the matter would be put right; but, to the surprise and regret of all, the indignity was accentuated by filling the vacancies from below the aforesaid Military Secretary, on the plea that no one senior to him could now be appointed. Such an argument is ridiculous; there is nothing whatever in the regulations to support it. It may not be generally known that, besides the honour of the appointment, two out of the four aides-de-camp receive about £200 a year extra pay.

It gives me pleasure to see that the Military Mail has been compelled to apologise handsomely for certain reckless charges against the Canteen and Mess Co-operative Society and its directors published in the early part of last year. Reference was made in TRUTH at the time to the attacks which were being made on the Society in question, and the source and motives of them were pretty easy to guess. The principal allegation put forward in the Military Mail was that the Canteen and Mess Society had "plundered" a sum of £11,000 belonging to the soldier, which ought to be returned; and it was also asserted that for each attendance at a meeting the members of the committee received a sum of five guineas. An action for libel was commenced against the paper by Lord Fortescue and two other members of the committee, and the Military Mail has now been compelled to settle it by publishing an apology declaring itself satisfied that its statements were untrue, and paying all the plaintiffs' costs. The Canteen and Mess Society ever since it came into existence has been systematically assailed with all kinds of misrepresentation and innuendo by the interests, both in the Service and in commercial circles, which were affected by its operations, and it is satisfactory to know that the circulation of some of the worst of those calumnies has now been stopped and punished, even though the instigators escape.

On the question of the limitation of re-engagements for twenty-one years' service, which was referred to last week, the following remarks of an N.C.O. are interesting:—

There has been a lot of hostile criticism of Mr. Haldane's decision to limit the number of men allowed to qualify for pension. The amount of rot talked about men enlisting in order to earn a pension is stupendous. I have asked numbers of men in my own unit and others whether they had any idea of doing twenty-one years when they joined, and have always got an answer in the negative. If you leave out those who enlisted as boys, I doubt whether in the whole Army there is one per cent. who ever had that idea—I should almost venture to put it at one per thousand. Want of employment, pangs in the stomach from hunger, or a row with a lady-love, cause fifty more enlistments than the prospect of making a pension.

Again, we all of us know in the Service that the right, first, to extend from seven to twelve years, and, secondly, to re-engage are nothing more than privileges which can be refused by a C.O. without giving any reason. So I fail to see the grievance when the number allowed to re-engage is put under a fixed limit. If there is any grievance, it is certainly confined to men of ten to twelve years' service.

The growling, however, seems to be confined to men of ten to twelve years' service; and though they may not have any right to re-engage, they have a certain grievance when they have been soldiering on up to that time in the expectation that they would be allowed to do so if they acquitted themselves satisfactorily. It would have been kinder if a year or two's notice had been given before the limitation was enforced. As it is, it ought to be construed as favourably as possible to the men affected, as in the case of the Royal Artillery, already noticed. And I certainly think that it ought to be accompanied by a stricter limitation of service at twenty-one years. From the point of view of "preparedness for war," there can be no question as to what the choice should be when it rests between retaining a man of twelve years' service and a man of twenty-one.

The married people of the depot of the West Yorkshire Regiment are groaning against an order requiring them to settle up an account for breakages in the school and women's washhouse. The grievance is that the premises in question are used in common by the women and children of the whole garrison at York, among whom are another infantry regiment, two cavalry regiments, and detachments of A.S.C., and A.O.C., and that the damage ought, therefore, to be a garrison charge. The amount at issue is trifling, but that does not affect the principle of the thing, and it would seem to be by an oversight that the charge has been laid on one unit only.

An officer in the merchant service sends me a suggestion with regard to old age pensions, which seems deserving of consideration. He is of opinion that if a beginning is to be made with old age pensions, the mercantile marine offers a most suitable field for it. His point is that the employment of sailors is fully regulated by law, supervised by a Government Department, which keeps official records of every man's service, and even the payment of the men is made under the superintendence of a Government official. The machinery for working a pension scheme is therefore to a great extent in existence already.

My correspondent proposes a self-supporting fund, formed by the contributions of the men. He suggests that a contribution of 1d. per day, which would be deducted on payment of wages, would be no serious tax upon the men, and would be sufficient for the purpose, in view of the high rate of mortality in seafaring life, and provided the fund were supplemented out of the wages forfeited by deserters; and in the event of men leaving the sea and going into other trades, he proposes that they should be allowed to keep up their contributions to the fund. I am afraid that all old age pension schemes involving contributions are now very much out of favour. But there is no reason whatever why a contributing pension scheme should not be established in the merchant service, without waiting for the day when a Government will find itself in a position to confer old age pensions on everybody.

A FUTILE THREAT.

A barmaids' champion, I see,
Expressed the fervent wish that she Might Herbert Gladstone find
Among her audience that night,
So she bestow upon him might
  A fragment of her mind.

Methought her menace (truth to state)
Scarce likely to eventuate;
  Since not, though e'er so clever,
Could she her mind on him bestow,
Till first she'd learnt that mind to know—
  Id est, in woman, NEVER!

Sudbury preceded London by returning to its Council a number of so-called municipal reformers, who last week distinguished themselves by proposing that the Town Clerk should be dismissed, and the duties of his office transferred to the borough accountant. Apart from the absurdity of the amalgamation, this treatment of the solicitor who for over twenty years has filled the office of Town Clerk was on discussion considered too shabby, and he was let off with a reduction of his salary from £180 to £100 a year. That is £40 less than the borough rate-collector receives. Where extravagant salaries are paid to municipal officers it is right that they should be cut down, but I should not have thought that £180 a year was an excessive amount to pay the Town Clerk of a borough like Sudbury, and the reduction appears to have been prompted by some petty personal feeling rather than a pure regard for the public interest. If a salary of under £2 a week is deemed enough for the Town Clerk, what, I wonder, do Sudbury reformers consider a sufficient wage for a scavenger?

The following is from a legal correspondent. Nobody would wish to see the judges sweated, but there is a good deal of force in the criticism that the sittings of the courts have been unduly shortened, though for my own part—as I am sometimes obliged to appear before their lordships—I should regret any interference with the adjournment for luncheon. The reform of the circuit system is unquestionably a measure by which valuable judicial time might be saved:—

That hardy annual, the bitter cry of the Judges of the King's Bench Division for more judges, is now in full vigour. At the late assizes all the Judges have poured their lamentations upon the subject into the ears of the grand jury, at each assize town. If such a want exists, which I think is not the case, it seems to me to be due to the short hours which the Judges now sit in court, and to their unwillingness or inability to stop the great length at which cases are now heard. Many persons are still alive who recollect the Judges sitting in court for six hours on six days in the week, with a very short, and in some cases, without any adjournment for luncheon. Now they do not sit on Monday until 11 o'clock, and on the other days of the week until 10.30; they rise at 4 p.m., and on Saturdays at 2 p.m., and they all take a liberal three-quarters of an hour for luncheon. Surely it is not too much to expect the Judges to give six hours' work in court every day, with a Saturday half-holiday, which is often a whole holiday. The long vacation lasts for nine weeks, and besides this, the Judges have three weeks' holiday at Christmas, and twelve days at both Easter and Whitsuntide. Their holidays therefore amount to more than fifteen weeks in the year. The other cause of the alleged want is the great length to which cases are now allowed to go on. It is much easier for a Judge to try one case, which lasts two or three days, than to try three or four cases in the same time, and the present Judges do not seem to try to shorten trials.

If more time is wanted for hearing cases in London, it might be obtained by alterations in the Circuit system, and by grouping together, for assizes, the counties where there is little work, as is done at the autumn assizes. The present assize towns were fixed centuries ago, when communication between places was difficult and often dangerous, but that reason does not now exist. At the late assizes in North and South Wales, all the criminal and civil business of both circuits, except in Glamorganshire, might have been got through by the two Judges in three or four days instead of one circuit lasting twenty days and the other seventeen days, without counting the days in Glamorganshire and Chester. Formerly, Judges of assizes had to pay their own circuit expenses, but a few years ago they were granted £7 10s. for their expenses on each day the circuit lasts, including Sundays.

Apropos of a paragraph published last week, I am interested to learn that a proposal for the exemption of the borough of Bolton from the jurisdiction of the Salford Hundred Court of Record is under the consideration of the local authorities. By means of Acts of Parliament or Orders of the Privy Council the towns of Oldham, Middleton, and Bury have obtained this exemption, and at Bolton Mr. Matthew Fielding, a local solicitor, has lately put forward some forcible reasons why that borough should take the same course. The maintenance of the jurisdiction of the Salford Hundred Court over outlying districts, at any rate, is really an indefensible anachronism. It serves no legitimate purpose that is not better served by the County Court. Its procedure may easily be employed harshly and oppressively, and, as I have frequently pointed out, it is with this express object that the court is so largely patronised by the moneylending fraternity. Poor and ignorant debtors residing at a distance from Manchester are not only bewildered and baffled by the technical pleadings, but are unable to incur the expense of journeying to the court, with the result that judgment is given against them in their absence, and they are, moreover, saddled with costs on a most extravagant scale.

One of the anomalies—not to say abuses—connected with this ancient court is the payment of a third of the fees to the Earl of Sefton as Lord of the Manor. His lordship is guaranteed a minimum of 200gs. per annum, but, according to the last Parliamentary return, he was that year entitled to receive £433 2s. 8d. Such an arrangement as this—a belated survival from feudal times—is in itself a sufficient condemnation of the existence of the court.

A solicitor who has had a good deal to do with compensation cases for personal injuries complains of the obstacles that are thrown in the way of poor patients by hospital surgeons. He not only asserts that he has been frequently met with great discourtesy when endeavouring to obtain information, but that it seems to be a regular practice of hospital doctors to demand a fee of a guinea before they will give any professional information. The result often is that if the patient cannot afford a guinea, the solicitor must fee the doctor out of his own pocket before he can ascertain for certain what sort of a case his client has got; and as the most prosperous solicitors are rarely disposed to disburse money in the dark like this, one consequence is that poor people are driven in these cases into the hands of the class who will "take up the case on spec.," at proportionate profit to themselves if the "spec." turns out well. It seems unreasonable for doctors to stickle for preliminary fees like this, because, as my correspondent observes, if the case is a good one they will eventually receive fees on subpœna; and it will be a surprise to many people to learn that hospital doctors are accustomed to deal with their patients in such a spirit.

In January last attention was directed in the Hampshire newspapers to the shooting of game on Sundays on an estate in the district of Whitchurch. It was stated that on one occasion as many as seven guns, with seven beaters, were out, and as such Sunday shooting is absolutely illegal, the names of the offenders were given to the police, with other necessary information, for the institution of a prosecution. Up to the present, however, no prosecution has taken place, and in these circumstances I am not at all surprised to learn that the people in the neighbourhood have come to the conclusion that there is, after all, one law for the rich, and another for the poor. It would be interesting to know whether the case ever came under the notice of the Chief Constable of Hampshire, or whether some subordinate local officer was responsible for the decision not to prosecute.

An enlightened method of dealing with juvenile offenders has been adopted during the past six months in Hull. Instead of bringing children charged with offences against the law before the magistrates, and thus subjecting them to the degrading environment of the police court, the Chief Constable has made the cases the subject of personal investigation and of talks with the youthful offenders and their parents. Six hundred cases have been dealt with in this way with such gratifying results that the scheme is to be continued and an inspector appointed to assist the Chief Constable in this department of his work—a wise policy.

A circular issued by the Home Office with regard to the uselessness of sentencing a vagrant to a few days' imprisonment only was read by the magistrates' clerk at Bolton the other day. When a man was known to be a habitual tramp, it was observed, a sentence of less than fourteen days would produce no useful effect, and the magistrates, prompt to act on the advice, committed a prisoner before them to a month's imprisonment. I should very much like to know who is responsible for the issue of such ill-judged advice. To assume that fourteen days' imprisonment, or a month even, is likely to act as a deterrent to the habitual vagrant shows a singular lack of appreciation of the difficulties of the vagrancy problem, and the advice to inflict heavy sentences is merely pandering to the natural inclinations of Shallow.

There ought to be an inquiry into the conduct of the police and the magistrates in the case of a young man named Quarterman, whose unconditional release from prison was ordered by the Home Secretary last week. It appears that Quarterman was charged before the Watlington (Oxon) Bench with the theft of a piece of beef, and that the Bench, holding that there was not sufficient evidence upon which to convict, discharged him. A few days later—on a Sunday—Quarterman was re-arrested on the same charge, and next morning he was taken before the Bench and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The only additional evidence was an admission which the prisoner was alleged to have made on being interrogated by the police. At the second hearing Quarterman was undefended, the solicitor who had appeared for him on the first occasion not having been informed that he had been re-arrested.

Not only was this a case in which the prisoner should never have been convicted at all, but the re-hearing of the charge was an outrageous irregularity. As I understand, the defence of autrefois acquit is as conclusive in proceedings before magistrates as in a trial by a jury, and the charge against the prisoner having once been dismissed upon the merits, the police had no right to arrest him again, and the Bench no right to convict him. Probably the man himself was unaware that he could raise this defence. His ignorance, however, would be no excuse for the conduct of the police and the magistrates, and the summary manner in which he was dealt with in the absence of his solicitor wears a particularly ugly look.

PITFALLS OF THE LAW.

(To Mr. Justice Warrington.)

Of pitfalls of The Law I've heard,
But ne'er till last week saw
(So whispers me a little bird)
A pitfall for The Law.

By fellow feeling kind now made,
May'st thou, when technic flaw
Would baffle Right, thy suitors aid
From pitfalls of The Law.

The leniency shown to offenders in a number of cases of aggravated assaults upon women forms the chief feature of my Legal Pillory this week. The Nottingham magistrates are of opinion that the petty thief is a much more dangerous ruffian than the man who kicks his wife so severely that she has to be detained in the hospital for days. Even more startling is the action of the Bootle magistrates who think a fine of 10s. sufficient punishment for the ruffian who knocks a woman down and kicks her, breaking her leg. Some interesting comparisons are afforded in the fines inflicted upon motorists, and those imposed for offences which are much more likely to prove dangerous to the public. In addition, there are included three cases of cruelty to animals where the offenders had well earned a term of imprisonment but were let off by misguided magistrates with fines.

Nottingham Borough Police Court. Before Alderman Jelley and Mr. A. H. Franks. Henry Dykes, charged with assaulting his wife. He kicked her so severely that she was kept four days in hospital. Seven days.

Cupar Sheriff Court. Before Hon. Sheriff-Substitute Armour. James Robertson, charged with assaulting his wife by striking her on the face with a plate. Fined 10s.

Dunfermline Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Shennan. Peter Murray, charged with assaulting a relative by kicking her. Fined 15s.

Bootle Police Court. Before Messrs. R. W. Hall and H. H. Winstanley. S. T. Browning, charged with an aggravated assault on Mary Carroll. He knocked her down and kicked her, breaking her leg. Fined 10s. and costs.

St. Helens Police Court. Thomas M'Manus, charged with an aggravated assault on his wife. He beat her about the head and face, and kicked her. She was covered with bruises from head to foot. Fined 40s. and costs.

Sheffield Police Court. Before Sir J. Bingham and Mr. W. R. Carter. J. T Swift, charged with neglecting his five children. He sat drinking in public-houses while the children were found on several occasions without a fire in the house and crying for food. Adjourned to give him another chance.

Stratford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Chapman, Bailey, Bodger, and Aitchison. H. T. Buckingham and H. Foster, charged with furious driving. They were racing on the high road. Fined 10s. and 4s. costs.

Welshpool Borough Petty Sessions. Before the Mayor and Messrs. Owen, Jehu, Humphreys, J. Jones, and J. Pryce Jones. E. Green, a farmer, charged with being drunk in charge of a horse and trap, and with cruelty to the horse. He drove furiously backwards and forwards, lashing the horse with the whip until it dropped dead. Fined £1 and costs for the first offence, and £5 inclusive for the second.

Nottingham Borough Police Court. Before the same magistrates. James Voce, charged with stealing a watch and chain value 10s., the property of his father. Two months' imprisonment.

Framlingham Petty Sessions. William Gooderham, charged with killing a partridge without having a licence or certificate. Fined £2, and 12s. 11d. costs.

Rushden Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. F. Knight and J. Claridge. F. Cushion, J. Smith, and Lily Smith, wire workers, charged with sleeping in an outhouse. Fourteen days' hard labour each.

Derby Borough Police Court. Before Sir E. T. Ann and Mr. W. G. Norman. F. Butler, a homeless groom, charged with stealing five eggs and a pair of boots. One month for the first offence, and two months' hard labour for the second.

Isle of Wight County Sessions. Before Admiral Sir A. de Horsey, Col. Crozier, and Messrs. Shedden, Cochrane, Upward, Chatfield Clarke, Fellows, Dabell, and Major Arnell. H. F. Lewis, charged with stealing a handbarrow from his mother. One month's hard labour.

Sheffield Police Court. Before Messrs. T. C. Newton and W. L. B. Hirst. W. McDonald, charged with attempting to steal a florin. He was standing at a window which was broken, near which the florin had been placed on a sewing machine. Three months' hard labour.

Wokingham County Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Knox, Huntrey, Watson, Macnabb, and Col. Mackenzie. J. E. Rooney, charged with driving a motor-car at a dangerous rate, 25 miles an hour. Fined £10 and 12s. costs.

Arundel County Sessions. Before Capt. Hills, Messrs. Mostyn, Rawson Shaw, Travers, Henty, Heasman, and the Mayor. A batch of motorists charged with exceeding the speed limit, were fined respectively £5 12s., £5 8s., £5 14s., and £4 15s.

Arundel Borough Sessions. Before the Mayor and Alderman Herington. Three motorists, charged with exceeding the speed limit, fined £4 8s., £6 13s., and £5 16s. respectively.

Handsworth Police-court. Before Messrs. F. M. Thompson and G. Salter. E. Neale, charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal had been turned out since Christmas on ground covered with brick ends, and died from starvation. Fined 50s. and costs.

Chesterfield Police-court. Before Mr. A. H. Fowler and other magistrates. T. W. Green, charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal had been turned out all the winter until it became a mere frame of skin and bone. It fell, and, being unable to rise, had to be killed. Fined 40s. and costs.

Owing to the continued prosperity of the notorious Tanquerey, there seems to be a considerable revival of the "free portrait" trick in this country. A newcomer in this line of business is the New British Studio, 84, High Holborn. As this firm works by means of canvassers, who call at houses, and are apt to obtain from ladies orders for enlargements of photographs by verbal representations, it seems desirable that heads of families should warn their female belongings of the nature of the trick—provided that they know it themselves, which does not appear to be always the case. It is always possible, of course, to refuse payment for the "free" portrait when it comes to be demanded; but the victim is then apt to find, as in the case of Tanquerey, that he has parted with a photograph to which he attaches some value, and has great difficulty in recovering it, unless he carries out the alleged bargain.

The "luggage in advance" trick was tried last month —unsuccessfully, I am glad to say—on two French ladies keeping a modest boarding house at Havre, the operator using the name of "J. Kerr, Carman and Contractor, 5, Holywell Row, E.C." A "Mrs. Mortimer" first writes from 157, High-street, Walthamstow—doubtless an accommodation address—desiring to place her two daughters in the boarding-house while she goes to join her husband in India. The terms having been settled, Mrs. Mortimer next writes from "Paris" (no other address), stating that she is there with her daughters owing to the illness of a relative, and requesting the lady at Havre to pay the charges on the girls' luggage, which she has ordered to be forwarded, having had to leave England in a hurry. Simultaneously arrives the invoice from "J. Kerr" for charges amounting to fr. 39.95, which must be paid before the luggage can be despatched from Charing Cross.

Fortunately the ladies at Havre took advice and did not pay the money, and, of course, they have heard no more either from Kerr or Mrs. Mortimer. Kerr's invoice is a beautifully got-up document adorned with a picture of a railway engine pulling one of Kerr's pantechnicon vans, and evidently printed in England But the writing on it, as also of Mrs. Mortimer's letters, is obviously French, and this is clearly a case where a French gang are working the swindle against their own countrymen. 5, Holywell-row, E.C., is merely an address where letters for "J. Kerr" have been received. As all the thieves in this line of business are careful to use only accommodation addresses, it is very difficult to catch them; but it is quite certain that a good many other people abroad have received "J. Kerr's" attentions besides the two ladies above mentioned, and if the police were promptly communicated with, they ought to be able to trap the gang. The French newspapers should warn their readers against this lucrative swindle.

From an office at 3, Wine Office-court, E.C., is issued a tipster's sheet called the Sporting Globe Special. A specimen copy of this publication, dated March 11, was sent by post to one of my readers on March 14. Out of five tips for races on the 12th and 13th, no fewer than four winners were given, while the other horse was placed. On the other hand, out of nine tips for the remaining three days of the week no fewer than eight were losers, the solitary winner being, moreover, an animal that started at odds on. The change in the prophet's form was certainly remarkable. Can it be that his brilliant success on the first two days was due to the fact that the results of the races were known before the specimen copies of the paper were printed and distributed? Such a trick has often been practised.

A novelty in the literature of the touting commission agent is a circular issued by Mr. Ludor Beecher, of 43, Sheen Park, Richmond, Surrey. Ludor—a man with such a distinguished Christian name must not think one unduly familiar in giving him the full benefit of it—introduces himself thus:—

> I have been an Assistant Master for some years, and am a member of two well-known London football clubs, and have represented my County.
> Being possessed of some spare capital, I am offering to men of my own and other Universities the means of doing their business in a strictly confidential and secure manner.
> I propose offering you a credit of £2, without asking for the usual references, etc., etc.

Ludor explains that owing to the new Betting Act, "a great many small bettors have been prevented from doing their business by the great expense of sending money across the water," which seems to imply, in a manner hardly flattering to the members of his own and other Universities, that they have hitherto been in the habit of doing their betting at street corners. He gives, however, convincing evidence of his academic qualifications. He has entangled his remarkable name in the classical motto "Dum Spiro Ludo," and he commends his business principles to clients in this polyglot outburst:—

> On receipt of your application for me to execute your commissions, I will reply accepting same. "Quodcunque imperatum erit, fiet. Ce que vous voulez, je le ferai. Was sie befehlen, das tue ich."

It is melancholy to see so much learning reduced to this extremity, but it shows what the University man who takes to school-mastering may come to in these days.

I think Lord Northcliffe should advise his Answers young man to leave the subject of usury alone—it is evidently much too abstruse for his immature mind. "Honest Moneylending: How old 'Shixty per Cent.' may be Avoided," was the alluring title of an article which this journalistic innocent published the other day. While expressing a hope that "the day of the blooksucking moneylender is done," he remarked that "it is pleasant to think that there are in existence responsible companies to which we may resort in the moment of embarrassment"—companies granting loans "at rates which are perfectly legitimate." By way of example, particulars were set forth of the terms on which advances, ranging in amount from £5 to £100, are made by an unnamed company in the City. The company, it was explained, does not entertain hazardous business of any kind, adequate security for every loan being insisted upon. On such security, it appears, the sum of £100 can be borrowed, "to be repaid by twelve weekly instalments of £9 2s. 0d." This is the ingenuous scribe's idea of a perfectly legitimate charge, "a change for the better" from the extortion practised by the grasping sixty per cent. Shylock. As a matter of arithmetic, taking into account the weekly reduction of the principal, the interest exacted by this "responsible company" works out at the rate of nearly 80 per cent. per annum.

Some surprising performances in the way of the treatment of disease by "thought waves" are promised by a Mr. Leonard Hall in a pamphlet which he is advertising at the price of 3d. The principle of the treatment is extremely simple. It is a scientific fact, according to Hall, that bad thoughts produce a chemical poison in the system, while good thoughts have a beneficial chemical effect, like a seidlitz powder. It is also a scientific fact that one thinker can transfer his thoughts to another thinker. Hall gives you a picture of a Marconi installation to show how it is done, but a picture of Mr. and Mrs. Zancig would have been more helpful. Starting with these principles, it is easy to see that when a person is unwell in consequence of unwholesome thoughts, he can be put to rights in a moment by a little thought transference from a more healthy thinker. Supposing it was the patient's dinner, and not his thoughts, that had upset him, Hall seems to think that the process would work equally well.

When you are out of sorts, what you have to do is to pay Hall £1 a month. This covers half-an-hour's daily treatment, Sundays excepted. What Hall does is thus explained:—

> I shut myself up in my private office from six o'clock until ten o'clock, allow no one to disturb me, and, barring five minutes of deep breathing and muscular relaxation every half-hour, I devote my whole mental and nervous force to concentrating my mind upon the so-called "Health Vibrations" in the interests of my patients. . . .
> While I am practically treating patients for four hours, I would not advise patients to take more than half an hour of the vibration each day. . . .
> The effect of a strong telepathic treatment is described differently by different people, according to their nervous temperament, etc. The most common report which I have from my patients is that during the first few minutes there is a sensation of increasing warmth all over the body, followed by a distinct tingling, especially in the diseased parts of the body, this being generally followed by a comfortable calmness and feeling of strength. . . .

Obviously this is not a luxury to be overdone. It sounds very much like what one reads about the effect of alcohol, and Hall is right to limit his patients to half an hour a day. The treatment is apparently identical with that of Christian Science, only at a mere fraction of the price. As Hall points out, £1 a month is only 9d.

a day; and as the exhausting nature of the work precludes his doing more than four hours per diem, he can only earn 6s. a day, and he is obliged to rest completely on Sundays. True, not everybody can make 6s. a day by merely shutting himself up in his room and thinking; but office rent, advertising, printing, and postages have to be taken into account. I should say, therefore, that either the healer must manage to think of several patients at once, or else he expects to make his profit by selling his pamphlet at 3d.

SOULS — BY THE OUNCE.

Our human souls, in point of weight,
To scale an ounce apiece are found;
At least—so Yankee doctors state—
They run sixteen to every pound.

Now, weights and measures, wet or dry,
To standardise our laws compel,
That purchasers, in what they buy,
May get full worth from those who sell.

We've standard weights, arranged and classed,
For everything from coins to coals;
Maybe, ere many years are passed,
We'll have a standard weight for souls.

It is always amusing to see a masterpiece of sustained irony accepted and answered in its literal sense. The Daily Mail had a very clever article last week on the "Wastrel" Ministry now in office, showing how the Government has caused depression on the Stock Exchange and driven Consols down to a record point. The writer's intention, no doubt, was to burlesque the Daily Mail attacks on the County Council and draw a reductio ad absurdum of the much-abused term "Wastrel." But several Liberal journals have answered the article quite seriously, and proceeded to show how the Stock Exchange fared and how Consols fell under the late Government, and what the present one has done to restore sounder financial conditions. The humorist who wrote the article could not desire a more genuine compliment. I hope it will encourage him to try his hand again, and show us how the London County Council election led to the late fall in American Rails.

A female suffragist, who does not know if I ever give a hearing to people who are not of my way of thinking, invites me to tell her on what ground I say that the majority of women are against women's suffrage. I am pleased to answer her on both points by saying that the only ground I have for my statement is my own observation, which I always prefer to the observation of other people. I have not counted up my female acquaintance, nor even the number whom I have heard expressing their opinion on this subject during the last few months, but I suppose the total comes to some hundreds. If I except one or two ladies connected with the movement whose acquaintance I have made in political life, the whole of them, to a woman, are dead against the demand for votes. As to the "physical force" movement, the vast majority of women one meets seem to be not only against it, but far more severe upon the "suffragettes" than men. Wherever one goes, and among women of all ranks and classes, one hears the same opinion. Since the above question was put to me, I have made a point of asking nearly every man I have met how many female suffragists he is acquainted with, and in this way I have heard of the existence of two women who desire votes. I am, therefore, convinced that the vast majority of women are against the movement, and I shall not believe the contrary until I see an authoritative record of the number on the other side.

Another lady, who also appeals to me on the audi alteram partem principle, points to the large number of women now engaged in business of one kind and another involving, directly and indirectly, the employment, not only of women, but of men, and seems to think it a grievance that men thus employed should have a voice in making the laws which govern their women employers who are voiceless. My dear lady, what is the use of arguing like this? No one denies that all women have to obey the laws, and that they have no voice in making them. Whether this is or is not to the advantage of the community is the question at issue, and it will not be affected by pointing out that women are employers, or employed, or mothers, or virgins, or any other fact which anybody knows. There is no difference, so far as I know, between the laws applicable to male and female employers of labour, and no reason why there should be. I hope that no more would-be lady voters will ask me to publish or discuss their views, for there is nothing to be said on the subject which has not been repeated ad nauseam, and there are plenty of editors ready to publish communications on the subject and to regard them far more sympathetically than I can.

It is no doubt true that there are a good many women who are much better fitted to vote than a good many men. It is equally true, however, that there are a good many men who are much better fitted to vote than a good many women. The broad issue whether it is desirable to admit women to the franchise must be looked at broadly and decided on grounds of general principle. No franchise short of that enjoyed by men can be more than a temporary measure, creating fresh grievance and injustice which will have to be redressed. Women must come in, therefore, if they are to come in at all, on the same terms as men, and must participate equally with men in all future extension of the franchise up to universal suffrage. Further, if men and women vote on an equal franchise, does any one suppose that women will not claim the right to sit in Parliament, or that the claim can be refused? It is the necessary logical consequence of the right to vote. These are the consequences that have to be looked at in considering the desirability of admitting women to the franchise. How many men are really in favour of them? Not one in a thousand, I should say.

It is sometimes asserted that working men are in favour of giving votes to women. Some of their associations are, mainly because they believe that it would strengthen the party of progress. I doubt this; indeed, Conservatives are in many cases equally in favour of the measure because they believe that they would be the gainers. According to my experience, working men are by no means for giving their wives and daughters votes. No class is more sound on the supremacy of men, and none hold more strongly that their womanhood should leave politics alone.

A SUFFRAGIST'S REMONSTRANCE.

'Tis strange, O Truth, you gibe and flout,
And mock our women's suffrage school;
But peg away, year in, year out,
In staunchly crying up Home Rule.

Yet if you would achieve that task,
To grudge us votes you are a fool;
For just you, sir, our husbands ask
If we're not demons at Home Rule.

"TRUTH'S" REPLY TO THE ABOVE.

Ma'am, I believe 'tis as you say,
Nor need I ask your spouse for proof
That you the foremost fiddle play
Beneath your own domestic roof.

Full oft I've marked his downcast mien,
In which extinct is every germ
Of independence, and have seen
Him writhing like a helpless worm.

That's why I've even Home Rule waived,
Rather than give you ladies votes;
For better Ireland breeched and 'nslaved,
Than free and swathed in petticoats.

I hear from what I believe is a good source that the papers left with M. Montagnini and now in the hands of the French Government are really most compromising to the Papal Secretary of State and the Papal Court. Not only do they clearly show that efforts were being made by Cardinal Merry del Val to prevent the visit of King Alfonso to Paris, but they prove that the French bishops were in favour of conciliation, and were urged to resist the French law by Rome. So compromising, indeed, are they, and so clear do they make it that the French ecclesiastical hierarchy were acting under orders, and in defiance of the advice of several of their own most eminent members, that it is probable that large concessions will be accepted on condition that they are not published. Secret negotiations, my authority assures me, are now on foot upon this basis.

That these papers are in the hands of the French Government at all is the best proof that Cardinal Merry del Val does not know his business. Diplomatic relations had been broken off between the Pope and France. M. Nisard, the French Ambassador to the Pope, had been recalled from Rome. The Nuncio Lorenzelli had been recalled from Paris. On his departure he left behind him all his official papers under the care of M. Montagnini, who was without any recognised diplomatic position. The French Government considered that a conspiracy was being hatched, and that the papers would throw some light on the matter. Of course, they seized the documents. The Nuncio should either have carried them away with him, or should, as is often done under such circumstances, have requested the representative of some friendly Power at Paris to give them hospitality. The idea of Cardinal Merry del Val that some friendly Power, or all Powers collectively, would demand the return of the papers only shows how ignorant the Cardinal is of the elements of all diplomatic usage. Technically, the French Government were absolutely within their right in seizing the papers, and M. Clemenceau would have been foolish indeed had he not availed himself of this right.

The truth is that the present Pope is a kindly, worthy priest, entirely ignorant of everything outside Italy. Left to himself, he would devote himself entirely to spiritual matters. Cardinal Merry del Val is a pushing, intriguing Spaniard, hand and glove with the Jesuits, and prepared to get his own way everywhere by allying himself with the most extreme Catholics. In this he is supported by many influential priests at Rome. Probably he regards Bossuet and the leading men who raised their voices against Papal pretensions as greater enemies to the Church than Luther. I have no personal prepossessions either for or against the Roman Catholic Church. I am glad that it has been reduced in France to the level of other sects, but I should be sorry to see it, or any other sect, unfairly treated. Were I its enemy, however, I should rejoice to see its destinies in the hands of the Roman politicians who now control them.

I am curious to know what reply will be made to the demand of the Egyptians to be allowed self-government by means of a Parliament. We went to Egypt in order to protect the bondholders. This was alleged as the ground for our interference. The Khedive Ismail was a reckless spendthrift, and he was always in monetary difficulties. When he was got rid of by the joint action of France and England, his son succeeded him. Then came Arabi's so-called rebellion. The Khedive had called together a Parliament, and Arabi and his friends were not only supported by that Parliament, but by the Khedive. We interfered, bombarded Alexandria, and vanquished the Egyptian army at Tel-el-Kebir, on which the then Khedive, to save himself, went over to the winning side. We announced that so soon as the Egyptians showed that they could govern themselves we should withdraw. But practically we have not taken one single step since then to educate the Egyptians in self-government by giving them representative institutions. Egypt is better governed by us than it ever was before; but we are not popular there, for the Egyptians do not approve of a foreign rule, and, being Mahommedans, do not approve of a Christian rule. This does not surprise me. It is what we ourselves should call patriotism, and we English would prefer the worst of English rules to the best of foreign rules.

Were there competition, the Suez Canal charges would undoubtedly be reduced, and were it not that we happen to hold Suez Canal shares largely, we should join with other Powers to insist upon such a reduction. A vast amount of the capital of the company was squandered, and yet a Suez Canal share, nominally of the value of 500 fr., now stands at 4,600 fr. The Conservatives have always boasted of the amount of money that we made by Disraeli's purchase of the Canal shares. But, as a speculation, we should no more have bought them than shares in a Rand mine. We did so on political grounds, because we wanted to acquire a hold on the Canal, and because its good administration was necessary not only in our interests, but in the interests of others, and, provided that we get a fair legitimate return on the investment, this is all that we can ask.

A despatch was published in a French Yellow-book from M. Waddington to the then French Minister of Foreign Affairs, in which the former gave an account of a conversation about Egypt that he had had with Lord Salisbury. Our then Prime Minister tells M. Waddington that it is a mistake to suppose that we desire to continue our occupation of Egypt, for this is a strategical mistake, and he adds that this is not only his opinion, but that of all our military and naval men that he has consulted. It has always seemed to me that there is much force in this view. Supposing that we were engaged in a war—say with France and Russie—we should have to maintain our hold on the Mediterranean, although we might strategically deem it wise to temporarily evacuate it. Were we to do so, we should be able to hold the high road to the East by blocking the Red Sea, and making the Cape route the only one. Moreover, we should have to largely increase our garrison in Egypt, because we could not be absolutely sure that a French or Russian army of invasion might not land. I should like to know whether our present military and naval experts agree with those whom Lord Salisbury consulted. In any case, however, it might be wise not to perpetuate a grievance, which not only is a legitimate one, but which would lead to the Egyptians turning against us whenever they may find a good opportunity.

I am all in favour of action at the Hague Conference being taken collectively, which is likely to strengthen the substitution of arbitration for war in disputes between nations. As, however, it is probable that two or more will now and then fight out their disputes, it is most desirable that their relations to neutrals, and the relations of neutrals to them, should be clearly defined, and should be such as to leave neutrals to pursue so far as is possible their commerce without let or hindrance. I doubt if any international agreement can go further than this. I am convinced that any agreement as to mutual disarmament is impossible, and still less do I believe in a fund of one million per annum being subscribed by all nations, and devoted to mutual carousing and the delivery of speeches and lectures in order to create good feeling. But I do not agree that efforts should be made, and rules laid down, in order to carry on war without those who engage in it greatly suffering. On the contrary, I would bring its terrors home to all.

I remember listening to a speech of the late John Stuart Mill in the Parliament of 1866. A motion had been made to mitigate the action of belligerents towards the civilians of the countries engaged in cutting each others' throats. Mill pointed out that this would lead to nations engaging in war. Armies would be regarded as gladiators fighting for the glory or interests of their country, and the tendency would be for civilians to engage in war lightly and cheerfully. I entirely agreed with him. I would have a war made so terrible in its results to non-combatants, who have brought it about by their action, that every country would hesitate long before incurring such consequences. During the Middle Ages the Italian Princes and Republics were always fighting. But the rules of war were so peculiar that even the warriors incurred little risk of danger. In one great battle only one man was killed, and he fell off his horse and was smothered in his armour.

SCRUTATOR.

DAKHYL v. LABOUCHERE.

THE daily papers have already reported the dismissal by the House of Lords of the appeal by Dr. Dakhyl against the judgment of the Court of Appeal in 1904 ordering a new trial of his action against Truth. As the new trial will now have to take place, although the first trial took place three years ago, I am precluded from making any observation upon the case; but I give below a full report of the judgments delivered on Thursday last by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Robertson, and Lord Atkinson, who heard the appeal:—

The Lord Chancellor:—My Lords, in this case, which was one of libel, the Court of Appeal has ordered a new trial; and I am driven to the conclusion that no other Order is possible.

The pith of the libel is that the defendant wrote of the plaintiff as a "quack of the rankest species" in connection with his service on the staff of the Drouet Institute. The defendant denounced the Drouet Institute, on what he claimed to be public grounds, as an organised system for dishonestly obtaining money from persons suffering from deafness, in hope of a cure.

The defendant pleaded that his accusation against plaintiff was true, and also that it was protected as a fair comment upon a matter of public interest. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £1,000.

I rest my opinion that the verdict cannot stand upon two grounds.

In the first place the defendant was entitled to have the Jury's decision on his plea of justification, whether the words used were true in the plain meaning which the Jury might attach to them. Unfortunately, the learned Judge told the Jury more than once that the term quack meant a pretender to skill which the pretender did not possess. If that were a sound direction, and really it was put as a direction, there could not be a verdict on this point against the plaintiff, for admittedly he possessed skill. But there are other meanings of the word quack, such as a person who, however skilled, lends himself to a medical imposture. The Jury were the persons to affix the true meaning to the words, and to say whether or not it fitted the plaintiff. But they had not the chance if they followed the Judge's direction.

In the second place the defendant was, in my opinion, entitled to have the Jury's decision as to the plea of fair comment, whether or not, in all the circumstances proved, the libel went beyond a fair comment on the plaintiff and on the system of medical enterprise with which he associated himself, as a matter of public interest treated by defendant honestly and without malice.

The plea of fair comment does not arise if the plea of justification is made good, nor can it arise unless there is an imputation on a plaintiff. It is precisely where the criticism would otherwise be actionable as libel that the defence of fair comment comes in. But the learned Judge put aside that defence, and told the Jury that unless a justification was proved they were bound to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and that unless justified the libel is not fair comment and cannot come within the region of fair comment.

I agree in what Sir Edward Clarke said to us of the evil which may flow from an Order for a new trial in this case. In all cases it is a most deplorable result, not to be entertained upon any but the most solid grounds, as the only means of redressing a clear miscarriage. In the present case I regret it all the more, because the amount of the verdict seems to indicate that the Jury took the plaintiff's view of the facts. But I cannot reconcile myself to allowing a verdict to stand when I am convinced that the opinion of the Jury was not really taken on two vital points on which the defendant was in law entitled to insist, and did insist.

Lord Robertson: My Lords, I entirely agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

Lord Atkinson: My Lords, I concur in the opinion that this Appeal should be dismissed and the Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

In the long and elaborate summing up of the learned Lord Chief Justice I find the following passages in addition to those quoted by the then Master of the Rolls in his Judgment:—"But I am entitled to tell you that the defendant is not entitled to call the plaintiff a quack because he advertises, and Mr. Shee very properly corrected himself when I pointed out that he had gone too far. Mr. Shee at first said, quite unintentionally, that a man was a quack if he advertises. I should have been bound to tell you that that is not the law. Mr. Shee very properly withdrew the expression, and said if a man advertises, it is some evidence of his being a quack. The fact of the plaintiff having advertised, and making up his prescriptions and sending them by post, has nothing to do with this case; the question for you is simply this: Aye or No, is this man, an M.D. of Paris, a quack or not?"

And further on, when dealing with the advertisement, the contents of which Dr. Prichard, Mr. Cheatle and Mr. Yearsley had described as absolute nonsense, the Lord Chief Justice instructed the Jury as follows:—"The publishing of that advertisement does not in any way show that Dr. Dakhyl was a quack, but if he was a party to that advertisement, and if it is not nonsense, of course, you would think that he was a man who had to a certain extent puffed a system, which may be a perfectly good system, in a way which was not very gentlemanly and not very straightforward; and if it is nonsense, it is a thing he ought not to have done. Upon that Mr. Shee says: 'I am justified in calling any man who was a party to such an advertisement a quack of the rankest description.' That is for you. All I can say to you is this: You have to consider it from the point of view of the evidence, whether because a man has published an advertisement showing that he is not a gentleman, that he is a man whom you would not like to have much to do with; but, on the other hand, it does not show that he is a quack. But if you come to the conclusion that he, a gentleman of medical skill, knew that that was a lie, you would not think very much of him."

From these and other passages to the same effect contained in the summing up, it is, I think, clear that at the trial Mr. Shee, on behalf of the defendant, put forward, or attempted to put forward, the same contention he has so clearly and forcibly put forward before your Lordships, namely, (1) that the accusation made against the plaintiff in the words which have been described as the sting of the libel, amounted in effect to this, and only to this, that the plaintiff "was a quack of the rankest species by reason of his connection with the Drouet Institute and by reason of his having resorted to and adopted the quack methods of that notorious establishment." And (2) that the libel so interpreted was true in substance and in fact, or if not, was a fair comment.

I do not for a moment suggest that the meaning thus put upon the libel by the defendant is its true meaning, but I think it would be impossible successfully to contend that it is not reasonably susceptible of that construction, or, to use the words of Lord Esher, in Merivale v. Carson, 20 Q.B.D., 279, that, "it could not be thought by any reasonable man to have that meaning." If that be so, as I think it is, it was the right of the defendant to have it in some form of words distinctly left to the Jury to say whether the meaning so put upon the libel by the defendant was, in fact, the meaning it conveyed to the mind of the ordinary reader. This, however, was not done. No such question was ever left to the Jury. The contention was practically ruled out, and the reason why it was not left to them is, apparently, this, that the libel, read in the sense so contended for by the defendant, does not necessarily impute to the plaintiff want of skill or professional incompetence at all; whereas it would appear to me that the learned Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that the words "he is a quack of the rankest species," necessarily conveyed an imputation of want of skill or incompetence, and that his instruction to the Jury on the point amounted to a direction to that effect. He treated the question of the plaintiff's "being a fully qualified man able to deal with the treatment" of the diseases treated in the Drouet Institution as being put beyond all controversy by his possession of the degree of M.D. of Paris, and nearly at the end of his summing up he uses the following words:—"It seems to me that the first question you have to consider is: Has the defendant established before you that this man was a quack of the rankest description? That is the sting of the libel. I am not going over it again. I have told you what that means, and you will consider it from that point of view. If the defendant has not established it then, of course, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict. Upon the other part of the case, if you think the system of the Drouet Institute, which Dr. Dakhyl is now carrying on, is a system which no competent medical man ought to be a party to, then you would not think so much of him."

But the only portion of his summing up in which he had purported to tell the Jury what those words meant was the passage first quoted by the Master of the Rolls, in which he stated that they meant not only "an incompetent person, but a person who puffs his own incompetence before the public," a person "who pretends to medical skill he does not possess."

With all respect to the learned Lord Chief Justice, I think he was in error in the course he took. I think that in effect he took upon himself to determine the question which it was the province of the Jury to determine, namely, the meaning which the libel in fact conveyed to the mind of an ordinary reader, the sense in which the words complained of were to be understood by that reader.

Upon the question of fair comment, with equal respect to the Lord Chief Justice, I think he also fell into error. To show that, it is only necessary to quote two passages from his summing up dealing with this subject. They respectively run as follows:—"(1) You were told yesterday, and you were told again this morning by Mr. Shee, that the real question here was—was this fair comment, and that if it is fair comment, the fact that the defendant has used strong or exaggerated language, if honestly used, would not prevent it from being fair comment. Upon one part of the case that is a perfectly just observation, namely upon that part of the case which involves the question of the kind of practice that the plaintiff has carried on; but I am bound to tell you (and I ought to tell you plainly and forcibly, as I indicated to Mr. Shee when he was addressing you, and when he rather invited my observation, and took it, as he always does, very fairly) that that has nothing to do with the personal attack upon the plaintiff as a man in his profession. If you find that the defendant has libelled the plaintiff in his profession as a medical man, the fact that the defendant wanted to comment upon a system which he did not approve of would be no justification at all. (2) Therefore in so far as this paragraph, if it be a paragraph, which is otherwise libellous, relates to the system carried on by the Drouet Institute, of which the plaintiff was the physician, and to criticising that system because it was a system purporting to advise people without seeing them—in so far as that is a matter for consideration what Mr. Shee told you about fair comment would be (and I tell you so) absolutely right, and you ought not to condemn a man because he has used strong language about it. The other branch of the case is the attack upon the individual, and, as has been laid down by many Judges of far greater experience and ability than anything I can ever hope to attain to, fair comment is not to be made the opportunity of personal attack. Therefore, the first question you have to consider is aye or no, is there any personal attack on the plaintiff in his profession as a medical man? If there is not, the personal element goes out of the case, and you may then consider a great deal of what has been said to you as to the criticism upon the system, but if beside the system which is supposed to be attacked and criticised there is personal comment, then you have to consider whether it is true."

The statement of the law contained in these passages is, I think, enforced in other portions of the summing up. I cannot find that it is qualified in any. It is, in my opinion, altogether too wide. A personal attack may form part of a fair comment upon given facts truly stated, if it be warranted by those facts; in other words, in my view if it be a reasonable inference from those facts. Whether the personal attack in any given case can reasonably be inferred from the truly stated facts upon which it purports to be a comment is a matter of law for the determination of the Judge before whom the case is tried, but if he should rule that this inference is capable of being reasonably drawn, it is for the Jury to determine whether in that particular case it ought to be drawn.

The well-known passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Crompton in Campbell v. Spottiswood (3 B. and S., 778) relied upon so strongly by Sir Edward Clarke, was not confined to literary criticism, but applied "to writers on any public matter," and distinctly laid down the principle that if base and sordid motives which are "not warranted by the facts" be imputed, the fact that the writer bonâ fide believed his imputation to be well founded affords no defence. Joynt v. The Circle Trade Company, 2 K.B., 1904, is to the same effect.

In this case the established facts might not warrant the personal charge made against the plaintiff of being "a quack of the rankest species," if that charge necessarily implied "incompetence or want of skill" on his part, but if, on the other hand, the libel bears the meaning contended for by the defendant, and, as I have already said, I think it is reasonably susceptible of that meaning, then the question whether the imputation was a fair comment in that it was warranted by the established facts was quite another matter, and should have been left to the Jury to determine.

The assumption on which the learned Lord Chief Justice appears to have proceeded, namely, that incompetence or want of skill was necessarily imputed to the plaintiff, shaped and coloured his whole summing up. It led him to instruct the Jury upon the law in a manner which amounted to misdirection, and prevented him from taking the opinion of the Jury on an issue raised by the defendant as to the meaning of the libel. It was, I think, an erroneous assumption, and the fact that it was acted upon necessitates that there should be a new trial, however hard it may be on the plaintiff to be burdened with the cost of a second investigation.

There can be no more just and wholesome rule of practice, in my opinion, than that laid down by Lord Halsbury in McDougall v. Knight, 14 A.C., 199, as to raising new questions on appeal, but this case does not come within it. The questions raised here are not new. They were, in my view, raised below, and practically ruled upon by the Lord Chief Justice in the course of the case.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE EDALJI CASE.

Nothing that has yet happened has shown more clearly the weight and strength of the opinion that has been formed in favour of a public inquiry into the Edalji case than the memorial of the professors of Birmingham University to the Home Secretary, and the protest of professors of Dublin University and other distinguished men which was sent to the Times by Dr. Maurice Gerothwohl. Both these documents were inspired by the discovery that there was to be no independent public inquiry into the case, and the most significant point about them is that both insist upon the need of such inquiry into the conduct of the police and the Home Office itself. The Birmingham petition speaks of an inquiry into "the conduct of all the officials concerned." The Dublin protest speaks, with greater precision, of "the conduct of all officials concerned, whether of the Home Office or the Staffordshire Constabulary." The Birmingham petition has been sent in, and Mr. Gladstone has answered it in a letter to Sir Oliver Lodge. In his letter Mr. Gladstone says, in complete contradiction of what had been previously understood, that he never had and has not any intention of investigating the conduct of the officials concerned. He goes on to explain that the case was considered by his predecessor in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown; that when it came before him early last year—this apparently refers to the application made to him by the Editor of Truth—"though he was not altogether satisfied with some of its aspects, he could see no adequate reason for interfering with the decision which had been arrived at"; but that later developments "have led him to think that it was necessary to submit the whole of the accumulated material to the review of experts of high judicial authority." We have here a full explanation of Mr. Gladstone's attitude, and of the private inquiry into the case which is now proceeding. But it is practically certain that this was not in the least what Sir Conan Doyle understood when he was informed that an inquiry was to be held; nor what Sir Robert Romer understood when he consented to preside over the committee of inquiry. There would seem to be some mystery behind it all, which is only too much in keeping with all that has gone before, and which does not promise well for the result of such inquiry as is being held.

There is, I suppose, a possibility that the report of the gentlemen now examining "the accumulated material" may be of such a nature as to compel Mr. Gladstone to order the public inquiry so obstinately refused. I confess I have not much faith in this, partly because I doubt whether all the material accumulated at the Home Office affords an adequate ground for forming a true and just opinion on the case, still more because it is difficult, after all that has happened, to believe that a genuine public inquiry, embracing the conduct of "all the officials concerned, whether members of the Home Office or the Staffordshire Constabulary" will ever be ordered by the Home Office except on compulsion. We shall probably know before many days are past whether this view is or is not well-founded. In the meantime, however, it is important that all who feel the need of such inquiry should be prepared for the worst, and when they know it, be ready to set in motion that compulsion which will alone be effectual. This, of course, can only be done through the House of Commons. There has never been a case which calls more loudly than this for a searching public judicial investigation. And no feature in it compels that conclusion more than the persistent opposition of the Home Office to every demand for inquiry, and every attempt to ascertain the grounds for its own decisions. This is a case in which a man was convicted on a primâ facie incredible charge, upon evidence the value of which depended absolutely upon the impartiality, straightforwardness, and veracity of the local police. The police are shown to have been ready in previous instances to believe the very worst against the prisoner on grounds which appear to be worthless and have never yet been explained. Subsequently to the conviction, again, the police are shown to have made obviously indefensible allegations against the man for no apparent purpose but to prejudice a pending appeal against the conviction. This appeal goes to the Home Office, and is there decided upon the strength of confidential communications between that Department and these same local police. The prisoner's friends ask to be allowed to see these confidential communications on which the conviction has been upheld, and permission is refused. For the space of three years afterwards the Home Office resists every attempt to ascertain what has passed behind the scenes. If the opinion is formed on this that there is something behind which will not bear the light of day, the Home Office has itself alone to thank. The facts which all the world knows are sufficient to justify the worst suspicions. The interests of justice, the desirability of maintaining public confidence in the good faith and integrity of the police, the equal desirability of protecting the Home Office itself from suspicion of screening police misconduct, all point to the necessity of giving full publicity to the true facts. When under these circumstances publicity is obstinately refused, regardless of the unfavourable inferences thereby suggested against the Department which gives the refusal, no one will believe that concealment is not being chosen as the less of two evils. I make these observations in anticipation of the result of the inquiry now proceeding. As the position stands they are justified by Mr. Gladstone's frank declaration that he has not the slightest intention of holding a public inquiry. If he hereafter alters that intention, so much the better. If he adheres to it, Parliament must know the reason why.

BISHOP BRINDLE AND HIS CLERGY.

On Sunday, March 10, the Rev. Father Meenagh addressed to his congregation at St. Mary's, Alfreton, a forcible complaint against the action of his ecclesiastical superior, the Bishop of Nottingham. References to the address have appeared in several local papers, and a full report may be found by those who desire it—it is worth reading—in the Alfreton and Belper Journal of March 15. The story affords a striking confirmation of all that has been said of late as to the autocratic disposition of the Roman Catholic Bishops in England, and their scant consideration for the interests and feelings both of the laity and the parochial clergy; and as regards the Diocese of Nottingham in particular, its effect is accentuated by what has recently been told of the action of Bishop Brindle towards Father Hays in the Market Rasen case.

As in the case of Father Hays, the aggrieved priest in the present instance is one highly respected for long and valuable service. He has worked for twenty-six years in the mining district of Derbyshire, where there is a considerable Catholic element, largely composed of Irish miners. Prior to his advent, Bishop Bagshawe, then Bishop of Nottingham, had been for some time unable to get a priest to take charge of the mission at Clay Cross. When Father Meenagh undertook it there was no Catholic church in the district, and no preparation for building one. He took up his quarters with the miners at Alfreton, and by strenuous exertions succeeded within a year and a half in getting a church built and opened at Clay Cross. He then set to work and built another church at Alfreton, and, having done that, he next got a presbytery built at Clay Cross. For all these years he has had good congregations in those two places, and has conducted the services almost without a break, walking twelve miles over the Derbyshire hills every Sunday to perform his duty. Some few years ago a gentleman named Wright, a wealthy convert to Romanism, settled at a house called Swanwick Grange, about a mile from Alfreton. He proceeded to build a private oratory in his grounds. In October, 1903, this oratory was opened to the public with the approval of the Bishop, and another priest has been regularly holding services there. The result has been to take away about two-thirds of Father Meenagh's congregation at Alfreton. This result was foreseen, and when Father Meenagh was informed of the proposal to open the oratory, he wrote to Mr. Wright saying that he could not assent to it. He pointed out that a large proportion of his congregation came from a neighbouring place named Ripley, to which the new chapel was a mile nearer than Alfreton Church, that the loss of these people would mean a loss of £50 a year to his church, and that if this support was lost, "Alfreton Mission will have to be closed, and this means the closing of Clay Cross also." The priest's protests, however, were disregarded both by Mr. Wright and by the Bishop. Apparently there was some arrangement for compensating Father Meenagh by a small dole from the offertory at Swanwick, and a few months ago the Bishop stated that 10s. a week was being paid to Alfreton. On hearing of this statement, Father Meenagh at once informed the Bishop that the largest sum he had ever received in one week was 6s., and requested that the balance which appeared to be due to Alfreton for the previous three years should be paid to him. The Bishop did not answer the letter—one remembers here how Father Hays' letters from New Zealand were left unanswered by the same prelate—but since that date the full 10s. a week has been paid.

It would seem, however, that Father Meenagh, after three years' struggle, has at last come to the conclusion that it is impossible to keep his mission going under these conditions, nor has he much motive for persevering in the attempt, seeing that the greater part of his congregation has disappeared. In the address above referred to he told his people he could hold out no longer, that he could not honestly beg for his mission under existing circumstances, that the church at Clay Cross could not exist without Alfreton, and that his twenty-six years' work was "knocked on the head." He pointed bitterly to the array of empty seats, and the one-and-twenty people present at Mass where he had long had eighty, and he asked whether Rome would allow two public churches to be closed for the sake of opening a private oratory, and whether this was the way to convert England. The good father is an Irishman, and does not measure his words when his blood is up; but no one can fail to sympathise with him, or to recognise that he has a real grievance. One can see, of course, the sort of justification that will be pleaded for the action of which he complains. It may be said that if fifty people who formerly attended his church now go to the private chapel, the chapel is a public convenience, and, so far, in the general interest of the Catholics of the district. But the private chapel was not built for the public convenience, but for that of a private individual. Had it been proposed to build a new church and destroy one already existing in order to save part of the congregation a mile walk, the proposal would not have been countenanced, and money would not have been contributed for the purpose. Father Meenagh is, therefore, right when he declares that his work has been sacrificed to suit the convenience of one wealthy Catholic, and if the result is that one, not to say both, of his churches is closed, the Church will have lost a public place of worship, erected at great labour and cost, and have nothing in exchange but a temporary right to use a private chapel. Setting aside altogether the lack of consideration for a priest who has laboured with admirable devotion and effect for over a quarter of a century, the Bishop's action is utterly impolitic from the point of view of Church interests, unless it be sound policy to subordinate all other considerations to the pleasure and convenience of one wealthy layman. No one can read of cases like this—two of them in one diocese within six months—without recognising how much cause English Catholics have to doubt the wisdom and competence of their bishops.

In the article of February 27, which gave the history of Dr. Carmont's successful struggle to stop the misapplication of the Mitchell Trust by the Scottish bishops, I observed that this case showed that there is an effectual remedy in the civil courts for the diversion of trust funds by bishops, if any one can be found bold and unselfish enough to put it in force. Among other letters since received in reference to that article is the following from a highly respected Roman Catholic priest, who has written to me on previous occasions:—

> The whole Catholic body should be grateful to you for your article of February 27. As you say, we have, no doubt, the government that we deserve, and yet our punishment is a heavy one, for we did not choose our present rulers, and in Southwark and Westminster they were imposed upon us against our wishes. Your columns have put before the world the only results that could be expected.
> You tell us that anyone of us can bring the squanderers of Church property to justice by moving the High Court. Is that so? What locus standi have I as a simple priest? I should not fear the honourable fate of Dr. Carmont: indeed, I doubt if in these days such a fate would befall me. In a little book written by Mgr. Goddard, entitled "Manual of Ecclesiastical Law and Practice in Missionary Countries," I read, on p. 45, these words: "Bishops may not without permission of the Holy See be prosecuted before the law Judge: but probably whenever this permission is asked for it will not be refused, because the tendency to recognise the authority of the land becomes greater every day in matters that are not purely spiritual, and in countries that are distinctly hostile to the Church."

Inasmuch as Archbishop Bourne and Bishops Amigo and Cahill seem to have been immediately concerned in the alienation of trust funds, the first step will be to ask permission of the Holy See to bring the whole matter before the High Court. This permission will no doubt be accorded, and thus all ecclesiastical censure may be avoided. But all this, of course, depends upon the question, have I, as a simple Catholic priest or layman, any locus standi before the High Court?

Pray, Sir, continue your efforts to help the Catholic body in England to understand and assert their position. Universal grumbling avails nothing. We need wise and strong action.—Yours truly, SENIOR.

This letter is interesting as showing how "ecclesiastical censure" may possibly be avoided by any one desirous of fighting the question in the civil courts. I cannot say, however, in view of what has happened hitherto, that I regard the prospect of obtaining the sanction of the Holy See to civil proceedings as hopefully as does my correspondent; and I should recommend any one who proposes to test the question to be prepared to face ecclesiastical censure if necessary, and every other inconvenience to himself, as did Dr. Carmont in the case of the Scottish Clergy Sustentation Fund. As to the question about locus standi I am not qualified to express an opinion. It is a matter for a lawyer. In the Scottish case Dr. Carmont's locus standi was not open to question. As a priest he had a sort of reversionary interest in the fund, which would clearly entitle him to seek the protection of the Court. It may be that any private individual who seeks to call a trustee to account must have some sort of personal interest in the trust. But as such interest in the cases in question extends almost to all Catholics in the dioceses concerned, there is a wide field in which to find a plaintiff, even if it be only a nominal one. I may point out that the question of the Southwark trusts has already been raised before the Charity Commission by one layman, who was certainly able to claim a locus standi for the purpose, and I presume that what would be sufficient to create a locus standi before the Charity Commission would be sufficient before the High Court. This is certain, that if episcopal administrators of trust funds are ever to be called to account and reduced to order, it will have to be done by the spontaneous action of aggrieved Catholics at a certain amount of personal inconvenience and expense. The hope which existed at one time of intervention from Rome in the scandals of the English Church has long since come to an end. It received the coup de grâce when Cardinal Merry del Val sent to Archbishop Bourne the letter addressed to him respecting the contemplated proceedings before the Charity Commission. Henceforth it is certain that if the Catholic clergy and laity desire to obtain redress of their grievances they must trust to their own efforts.

MORE LIGHT ON STREET NOISES FINANCE.

In the article in TRUTH of March 6 on the last balance-sheet of the Street Noises Abatement Committee, otherwise the Betterment of London Association, it was suggested that Bowden Green, the presiding genius of this concern, was once more practising the old trick of obtaining large sums by way of "deposit" from persons appointed as secretaries or collectors, by means of which he in former days victimised so many people in connection with the National Thrift Society. This inference was drawn partly from the fact that in his last account Green enters among his receipts a sum of £1,000 as "amounts advanced for the development of the movement during its early years," while on the other side he enters £250 as repayment of such advances, and £82 16s. 6d. as "interest on deposits"; and partly from information I received two or three years ago that this practice of obtaining deposits was again being practised by him, and that as much as £500 was being asked for a secretaryship. From my own knowledge of Green, I had no doubt in my own mind that this inference was correct; but I am now in a position to state the fact without any question at all. At least three gentlemen have deposited with Bowden Green sums of £300 during the period covered by his last account; and negotiations were pending with a fourth at the very moment when my article was in the press. The story of this last gentleman, whom it will be sufficient to refer to as Mr. B., shows exactly how Bowden Green is carrying on this game.

In the third week in February, under the heading, "Secretaryship and Investment," an advertisement appeared in the Daily Telegraph for a gentleman "able to invest a few hundred pounds for short period," as "secretary and interviewer in West End of London." Mr. B. replied to this advertisement, and had an interview with Bowden Green on February 23, when particulars of the proposed appointment were given him. After a second interview on February 25, when the appointment was verbally offered and accepted, an interview was held to sign the agreement on March 1. Green had professed to be in a great hurry to conclude the business, and that he really was in the greatest hurry is sufficiently shown by the fact that at this interview on March 1, before the agreement was signed, he produced a printed circular from the Betterment of London Association applying for subscriptions, on which Mr. B.'s name was already printed as West London Secretary, and also printed cards with Mr. B.'s name on them as representative of the Association, for his use in canvassing personally for subscriptions. It is also a significant circumstance that the agreement which he produced for signature was in a lithographed form. Although the date "first day of March" is also lithographed, blank places were left for the insertion of names, sums of money, rate of interest, etc., so that evidently Green did not go to the expense of having the agreement printed for this occasion only, but was laying in a stock for future use. Probably his old stock happened to have run out at this moment. The agreement is between the Betterment of London Association and Mr. B., and recites the appointment of Mr. B. as secretary of the West London branch, and that "the Association purposes raising a sum of about £3,000 for the extension and development of its work throughout the metropolis, and for promoting one or more Bills in Parliament, etc." It then makes the following agreement as to Mr. B.'s remuneration, namely:—

A salary and commission equal to one-half of the first five hundred pounds obtained by him for the Association, together with one-fourth of all amounts from five hundred pounds to one thousand pounds, and ten per cent. of all sums obtained by him above one thousand pounds. Upon all renewal contributions obtained by the said (Mr. B.), including those originally received without his instrumentality, it is hereby agreed that a uniform commission of twenty per cent. shall be paid to him. Upon the signing of this agreement the said (Mr. B.) shall deposit with the Association the sum of three hundred [pounds is evidently understood.—Ed.] upon which interest shall be paid at the rate of five pounds per cent., and shall be returned according to arrangement entered into on this date.

The arrangement referred to in the last paragraph was as follows:—

It is hereby mutually agreed and arranged that interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum shall be paid for the period of one year to (Mr. B.) upon his deposit with the Betterment of London Association. It is also agreed that at the expiration of one year from the date hereof, one-half of all amounts obtained for the Association by Mr. B., together with one-fourth of all other amounts coming to the West London office of the Association, shall be paid to Mr. B. until the amount of his deposit together with five per cent. interest on same has been returned to him, unless, by mutual consent, some other arrangement is entered into at the expiration of one year from this date.

Both these documents were duly executed on March 1, which was a Friday, and on the same night Mr. B. posted to Bowden Green two cheques for £150. Green had asked for two cheques because, for reasons best known to himself, he has two banking accounts, and he wanted to pay one cheque into each. The day after posting these cheques something occurred which made Mr. B. think that he had been a little incautious, and no one can deny that he had been. He knew nothing of the Betterment of London Association but what he had heard from Bowden Green, which was a great deal in point of words, but very little in point of substance. Green, according to his wont, had talked volubly of the magnitude of the work, and made a brave show of names of patrons and subscribers, press extracts, and all the paraphernalia on which he regularly trades, but when Mr. B. came to think the matter over, he reflected that he had absolutely no security for his money, and knew nothing of what prospect there might be of recouping himself in accordance with the foregoing agreement by subscriptions obtained from a sympathetic public. He therefore wired to his bank to stop the cheques, made an excuse to Bowden Green, and saw that gentleman again on Monday, March 4, when he suggested that some security should be given for his deposit. Green appeared to be exercised over the breakdown of the negotiations, but was not in a position to offer anything in the shape of security. Mr. B. then wrote to three of the gentlemen whose names are advertised as members of the Street Noises Abatement Committee, and their replies, which I will come to presently, did not encourage him to pay his money. On March 6 he saw the article in Truth on Bowden Green's last accounts, and so the negotiations ended.

Let us now look a little more closely at the agreement contained in the two documents above mentioned. The Betterment of London Association professes to want £3,000 for the extension of its work in London and the promotion of Bills in Parliament. A gentleman is engaged to take a leading part in raising this money. He is to put down £300 for one year at 5 per cent. He is to be paid, as salary and commission, 50 per cent. on the first £500 he collects, 25 per cent. on the next £500, and 10 per cent. beyond that amount. Considering that according to Green's last published statement, the income from subscriptions in the two and a half years ending December 31 last was only £1,446, the gentleman thus engaged would have to be not only extremely energetic, but extremely lucky, if he collected by his sole exertions £500 in one year. £250 of that goes into his own pocket, so that his exertions will only yield £250 towards the sum of £3,000 which it is the ostensible object of this arrangement to raise. In addition to this, he is to receive 20 per cent. on all renewals of old subscriptions that he obtains, and, in passing, I would point out the monstrous extravagance of paying over £250 a year to one of the secretaries of an association which, if Bowden Green is to be believed, has an income of less than £600 a year, and another paid secretary at its head office. But let us see what happens at the end of the first year. The secretary's exertions now begin to be devoted to paying off his deposit. To this purpose are to be applied 50 per cent. of all he collects, as well as 25 per cent. of all money coming to the West London branch from other sources. It would be absurd to suppose that the secretary's ordinary remuneration would be suspended after the first year, and there is nothing in the agreement to justify such a construction. If, therefore, the secretary is able to collect £500 in his second year, £250 of this will go to pay off his deposit and interest; while £125 will be due to him as salary and commission, leaving only £125 for the Association. Thus, at the end of two years, out of £1,000 collected from the public by this secretary the Association will have received £375, and all it will have got beyond that is a loan of £300 for a little over a year at 5 per cent. interest. The reader will see for himself that it would be necessary to engage eight secretaries on these terms, and to collect £8,000 from the public, in order to raise £3,000 in two years by this method.

It would be sheer waste of time to devote serious criticism to such an idiotic system of finance as this. From the point of view of the subscribers and the public, who are invited to support an important movement, it is nothing better than a fraud, since only 7s. 6d. out of every pound obtained in subscriptions by such means is to be devoted to the object for which it is given. From the point of view of the gentlemen who are invited to invest their money on such terms, it is very little better, since the prospect of their ever obtaining subscriptions to the amount which the agreement contemplates is quite visionary. As I have said, Green acknowledges in his last account subscriptions to the amount of £1,446 in a period of two and a half years, and a great part of this is collected by himself, or through the head office in Finsbury-circus. There is little likelihood, therefore, of the West London secretary being able to raise £500 in one year, even though he is to receive half of it himself, and in proportion as he falls short of raising this amount, so is his prospect of paying off his own advance deferred. Unless he can pay himself off in this way by his own exertions, there is absolutely no provision in the agreement for his being paid off at all. He has not a particle of security, and though it is a matter of law on which I hesitate to speak confidently, I cannot see that he would have under this agreement a right to sue for the return of his money, even if there were any one more substantial to sue than Mr. Bowden Green personally. The only real security he has is that when he comes to realise the impossibility of earning an adequate remuneration and repaying his loan by his own exertions, he may threaten to show up the swindle, and get Bowden Green into hopeless hot water with the various eminent personages under the shadow of whose names the game is carried on. If matters reach that point, what will probably happen, as has happened before, is that Green will advertise for a new secretary with a new deposit, and by this means pay off and silence the out-going man. This is what he used to do in the case of the Thrift Society, and from what I can learn it is what he is doing in connection with the Street Noises business. Of the three gentlemen above mentioned who have deposited £300, two have certainly not been paid off, and one of them is actually taking legal proceedings against Bowden Green at the present moment. I should think there is very little doubt that it was the pressing necessity of settling with the last-mentioned gentleman that made Bowden Green in such a hurry to get this £300 out of Mr. B.

It has been mentioned above that after he had become uneasy about the security for his £300 Mr. B. wrote to certain members of the "Council" of the Betterment of London Association. He obtained their names from the circular with his own name upon it as West London Secretary, which Bowden Green had printed before the agreement was signed. The full list on this circular is as follows:—

President: Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B.
Chairman of Council: Captain E. Murray-Cookesley.
Vice-Presidents and Members of Council include:—John Anderson, Esq., M.D; Sir Lauder Brunton, M.D., F.R.S.; Rev. Percival Clementi-Smith, M.A., C.C.; Colonel Andrew Duncan, M.D.; Alderman Sir John Whittaker Ellis, Bart.; John Fitzgerald, Esq.; Colonel H. Cooper Gleadow; Sir Robert H. Hobart, M.P., K.C.V.O.; Dr. Theo. B. Hyslop; Sir Alfred Jacoby, M.P.; Lewis J. Knuthsen, Esq., M.D.; Kenneth Lund, Esq., M.D.; Richard Loveland-Loveland, Esq., K.C.; Henry Morris, Esq., Pres. R.C. of S.; Robert Pierpoint, Esq.; Sir John Tweedy, F.R.C.S.; the Right Hon. Edmond R. Wodehouse, P.C.; W. Hale White, Esq., M.D.

The gentlemen whom Mr. B. wrote to were the chairman (Captain Murray Cookesley), the Rev. P. Clementi-Smith, and Colonel Andrew Duncan. He asked them whether they considered that if he invested £300 in the Association he would have any security or guarantee for its repayment, or words to that effect. Here are their answers:—

7, Cromwell-place, London, S.W., March 5, 1907.

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of this day's date. It is the first I have heard of your being appointed Secretary of the Betterment of London Association.

I consented to be Chairman of the B.L.A., but I was quite unaware that any change was contemplated in the secretaryship; and I do not see what security you could have for the investment you mention.—Yours faithfully, E. M. Cookesley.

St. Andrew's Rectory, Doctors' Commons, E.C., March 6, 1907.

Dear Sir,—Your letter surprises me. I never looked on the Betterment of London Association as an investment for one's money—save so far as it is an investment to pay an annual subscription in order to try to ensure peace and quiet!

I can quite understand that any paid official who has to receive subscriptions should be required to give guarantees, etc.—Yours very truly, P. Clementi-Smith.

24, Chester-street, Grosvenor-place, March 5, 1907.

Dear Sir,—I know nothing of the matter on which you write; but it seems to me rather an extraordinary thing that the appointment of a secretary should depend on his placing £300 without any security with the Association. Speaking entirely personally, I would have nothing to do with such a proposal.—Yours faithfully, Andrew Duncan.

The interesting feature about these letters is the complete ignorance displayed by all the gentlemen of the affairs of the Association and the doings of Bowden Green. All three obviously learn for the first time of the practice of obtaining heavy cash deposits from the secretaries, though attention was called to it in Truth several years ago, and it has been followed systematically ever since. When it is brought to their notice, one of them unequivocally condemns it; another, without exactly justifying it, suggests that security may properly be required from an official who has to collect money. If the latter gentleman feels sufficient interest in the business with which his name is so prominently connected to read this article, he will see that there is no room for this suggestion. The "deposit" only purports to be required for one year; after that the secretary is to apply half the money he can collect towards paying himself back, and when he has succeeded in repaying himself, no provision is made for any security to the Association for the cash he may subsequently receive. The deposit is simply a loan to the Association at 5 per cent. for twelve months, certain; and I suggest to Mr. Clementi-Smith and all his colleagues that, now they have been fully apprised of the facts, they should lose no time in ascertaining why such loans have been needed, and to what purposes they have been applied. It may be taken as practically certain that all the members of the "Council" are as much in the dark about the business management of the Association, as the chairman and his two colleagues above-mentioned. It is obvious that no meeting of this body for dealing with such matters as the financial administration and the office organisation are held, or the chairman and the others would not be so completely in the dark as to what is going on. I do not suppose that the "Council" has ever met, unless it be in a committee-room of the House of Commons for the purpose of considering a Bill, or at some other such function which Green gets up from time to time for the purpose of showing how much he is doing, and getting free notices of the "movement" in the press. In point of fact, the "Association" exists only in name. It has no constitution or rules, no elective organisation or officers. It is entirely run by Bowden Green, who is in uncontrolled management of its money and operations, and "Vice-Presidents and Council" are simply gentlemen who, like the chairman, have "been asked" (of course by Bowden Green) to allow their names to be used by him in those capacities.

I do not wish to be unduly hard on the gentlemen whose names appear in the above list, for two or three of them are personally known to me. But in the public interest it is necessary to say, regardless of personal considerations, that they are greatly to blame in this matter. The real purpose which they are designed by Bowden Green to serve is sufficiently shown by the printing of all their names on a circular appealing for subscriptions. It is solely by virtue of such names, used with all the skill that a professional subscription-hunter like Bowden Green knows how to employ, that money for this movement is obtained in sums of unknown amount from people who have not the slightest idea to whom they are giving or by whom their money is administered. Gentlemen who allow their names to be used for this purpose have a direct responsibility for the proper administration of the money which is given on the faith of their names. They cannot divest themselves of this responsibility by merely removing their names, as many appear to have done in the last two or three years, leaving Bowden Green free to replace them by others equally indifferent, and to carry on the game as before. It is not their business after the money has been obtained and disposed of to wash their hands of it. Their business is to find out what has become of it, to compel the rendering of proper accounts to the people from whom it has been obtained, and to take steps for the proper management of the business in future. At the present moment every gentleman in the list given above is morally as much answerable as Bowden Green himself for the preposterous financial statement which was printed in TRUTH the other day, and for the transactions between the Betterment of London Association and its paid secretaries, of which I have given a sample. There is only one way in which they can put themselves right with the subscribers and the public; that is, first, by insisting on a proper investigation of the finances of the Association for the last five years by an independent professional accountant, and the publication of proper accounts for the whole period; secondly, by the reconstitution of the Association on a proper legal basis, with an elective committee, a responsible honorary treasurer, and explicit rules. As long as any such association seeks to obtain a large annual revenue from the public, it must be conducted on the ordinary principles applicable to a business of this nature, and those who make any profit from it must be its paid servants, not its masters and rulers. Nor will such an association have much claim to public confidence if its principal official, even though a paid servant of the committee, has a record behind him like that of Mr. Bowden Green.

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

I.—The Social Catechism.

(For the use of Females.)

[Certain catechisms, conveying instruction in religious and political matters, having lately been published, and having been received with favour by the public, I have arranged with a number of well-known experts in various departments of knowledge, to compile elementary educational formulas in this shape for the benefit of readers of TRUTH. I trust that they will be found useful. The following is the first of them.—ED. TRUTH.]

QUESTION: Who are you?

ANSWER: A female animal, endowed with Social instincts.

Q.: What do you mean by these words "Social instincts"?

A.: I mean the instincts which qualify a woman to shine in Society.

Q.: What is Society?

A.: The circle to which I belong.

Q.: Of whom does it consist?

A.: Of myself—and others.

Q.: How do persons get into this circle?

A.: In three ways: by Birth, by Purchase, and by Push.

Q.: How did you yourself get in?

A.: By Push.

Q.: What is Push?

A.: Push is the faculty of forcing yourself in where you are not wanted and appropriating a place to which you have no right.

Q.: Have you, then, no right to your place in Society?

Q.: How comes it, then, that the other members do not eject you?

A.: Because nine-tenths of them are in the same boat with myself, and the rest do not count.

Q.: What are the characteristics of persons in Society?

A.: Frivolity, extravagance, self-indulgence, and self-advertisement.

Q.: Does it require much money to be in Society?

A.: It does.

Q.: Have you, then, much money?

A.: I have none. But I know those who have.

Q.: Who pays your rent?

A.: My man friend of the moment.

Q.: Your rates and taxes?

A.: Also my man friend of the moment.

Q.: Your servants' wages?

A.: I do not pay my servants wages.

Q.: How then, are you able to keep your servants?

A.: Because I have my house constantly full of guests, out of whom my servants make what they can in gratuities.

Q.: It is your guests, then, who pay your servants' wages?

A.: It is.

Q.: Your smart frocks?

A.: My dressmaker provides me with those, and I recommend her to my rich acquaintances.

Q.: It is your rich acquaintances, then, who pay for your smart frocks?

A.: It is.

Q.: Do you not, then, pay for anything yourself?

A.: I pay for nothing myself.

Q.: Who is Father Vaughan?

A.: A preacher who wastes his time in telling people what everybody knew already.

Q.: Why does he thus waste his time?

A.: Because he hopes to reform Society.

Q.: And will he ever reform Society?

A.: He will never reform Society. It is impossible.

Q.: Why is it impossible?

A.: Because, if it were reformed, it would no longer be Society.

THE THEATRES.

"Her Son," at the Playhouse, and "The Little Admiral," at the Lyric.

Mr. Horace Vachell is the author of several novels, as announced on the playbill before me, besides that from which has been adapted the play which he entitles "Her Son," and somewhat euphemistically describes as new. New in a certain sense, perhaps, it is, since we have not seen anything like it for a good many years. But the types of character and the way events develop were properties of the stage and exploited with some success in the seventies. We may not have grown wiser nor better than our predecessors, but we have become different from them in our theatrical tastes. We like a sense of reality to hover like a mirage over the stage, a possibility that the things presented to us shall have happened somewhere at some time.

Here and in the nautical play, "The Little Admiral," produced by Mr. Lewis Waller at the Lyric Theatre, we are very far from any such illusion. But while in "Her Son" there is some attempt at characterisation, taken every advantage of by Miss Winifred Emery as the incredibly good and kind young woman, who renounces the man she loves, because of his prior attachment, and adopts his baby by the other woman, in "The Little Admiral" it is not so. Yet here, too, we have in Mr. Lewis Waller an actor yielding to none in his power of fascination for certain large sections of the public; in Mr. A. E. George an artistic actor who in my view stands in the first rank with very few on his level. As the reckless young naval officer, so improbably rescued by Miss Millard's influence from a career of dissipation, Mr. Waller made sometimes even his ardent followers smile and ripple with laughter at his strange doings; Mr. George's performance as the old sea dog was an admirable study of amiable senility, a lesson to any young actor as to how the thing is done; but having no substructure of real thought to fall back upon, the play was bound to fail before a modern audience.

So, too, with "Her Son"; though there was some observation and some characterisation, yet its great length and the amount of repetition soon made one insensible of such redeeming points. Mr. Cyril Maude was, of course, interesting as the much-loved lover of two, but it is curious how far less he seems to grip and hold one when not playing one of his famous character parts. The little boy filled a large place in the piece, and, indeed, was always running on and off the stage. The part was well played, but ended by becoming very tiresome. Children, if introduced at all in comedy, should always be episodic, and if their presence is the pivot of the plot, it is quite feasible to make the audience realise this in the brief intercourse of five minutes or so. Too facile is that appeal to sensibility which brings tears to ladies' eyes because they, too, have little ones at home. Many of us have, but one goes to the play with other objects in view than to realise the happy fact that they are with us, and likely to be a burden and a blessing for many years to come.

I have often said that I do not believe it possible to construct from a novel a first-rate play. What category "Her Son" should occupy in the hierarchy I leave to the modesty or arrogance of its writer to decide. But I do not wish to conclude these remarks without expressing my pleasure that Mr. Cyril Maude has taken a leaf out of the book of the Court Theatre. He should continue to give plays trial trips at matinées, and if he selects these with discrimination there is every possibility that he may be rewarded for the possible loss of a few hundred pounds by the gain of many thousands accruing from an unknown masterpiece thus brought to light.

The Van Dyck, at His Majesty's.

"Un Peu de Musique" is the title, omitted on the playbill, of M. Peringue's amusing dramatised episode, adapted by Mr. Lennox from the French. Founded on a real incident, a mystification, the same incident transferred to art continues its sway. I did not happen to know the plot, and defy anybody to have guessed from Mr. Tree's acting what was to be the conclusion.

It was the actor's opportunity, taken too full advantage of by Mr. Tree, who, one would have thought, had already expended enough energy in the revival of what was termed by a wit "a prehistoric peep," in the shape of "The Red Lamp." Here his "I wonder" recalled my lay visits to the Haymarket when I was first at school, and I ceased to wonder at the hold "The Red Lamp" had on me when I witnessed in more mature years the excellence of Mr. Tree's "Demetrius." Yes, it is a great effort, and I hope he will not fail to play "The Red Lamp" in Berlin.

But I return to my muttons, and pick the bone I mentioned at the beginning of this paragraph. Why does not Mr. Tree see that the episode is but an episode, a short story on the stage? Why, having done with his praise of John Peters's self, does he not satisfy himself with a touch of the piano keys, a graceful toying with the Stradivarius, a brief reference to the Van Dyck? No, he must run up and down the whole scale till one is weary. It sounds almost uncharitable to say this in face of the very fine performance given by Mr. Tree and Mr. Weedon Grossmith. Nothing could be better than the humorous taciturnity, the gradually awakening alarm of the moneyed proprietor of pictures and other "cheaply acquired" property, when he believes himself to be shut up alone with a lunatic. Nor could Mr. Tree's strange voice and suggestive power be better employed than in embodying this most artful of masquerading thieves. For thief, not lunatic, is Arthur Blair-Woldingham. Only, having created a perfect effect, it is the artist's business to pass on, or, having nothing different to say, to cease saying.

The confusion of the last five minutes, with the sham lunatic assisting his accomplices to remove all the furniture and works of art, save the sham Van Dyck, and occasionally barking like a dog at the keyhole, behind which crouches the miserable Peters, in terror of his life—this it would be hard to beat for comicality, and, indeed, I think it is as amusing a five minutes as is to be had in London at this moment.

The London Hippodrome now rejoices in the possession of a Tyrolese giantess, named Marie Fassnauer. Her dimensions are thrice those of ordinary women, her height eight feet, and her hobby going to church and knitting underwear for little children, to whom she is much attached. Surely this brief account should attract to the Hippodrome those interested in length—and breadth. Auto-Atlas is also at present at the Hippodrome. This gentleman can with ease lift with his teeth a motor-car containing passengers from the auditorium. He performs other feats, and may perhaps attempt a greater than all—to court the fair Marie Fassnauer.

I see that the Lyceum Theatre is about to open again. The new tenants are called "Popular Playhouses, Limited," and deserve all praise if their intention of providing "the best of drama, thoroughly well mounted, and played by a cast worthy of the theatre," prove feasible, at half the price of any other West-End theatre. "Her Love Against the World" is the title of the opening play on the evening of March 30.

The statue of the late Sir Henry Irving will be the work of Mr. Thomas Brock, R.A. I am asked to mention that the final list of subscriptions will soon be published, and to add that all members of the theatrical profession who have not yet subscribed and wish to join in this memorial to their late chief should send their subscriptions to Mr. John Hare, 75, Upper Berkeley-street, W.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE M. CASIMIR-PERIER.

AS President of the Republic, M. Jean Casimir-Perier was a failure. He was too much la fille à papa to fit the place. As a private person and the President of the Anzin Collieries Company he was a success. He had been born to this position. His great-grandfather, Claude Perier, a Dauphinois notary, reorganised the Anzin collieries before the revolution, and prepared the way for their colossal prosperity. His son, who died of cholera in 1831, his grandson, the great friend of Thiers, and one of the best and most amiable of men, and his great-grandson, Jean Casimir, contributed to their prosperity. There was no break or swerving from a predetermined course in the administration. On the whole, the administration of the Periers made for the prosperity—or comparative prosperity—of the colliers. The last two Periers had an affable way of dealing with the mining population that prevented strikes, and when labour questions grew angry, facilitated compromises. The late M. Casimir-Perier's dinners and other feasts at the Elysée were the best set out and most intelligently sumptuous of any ever given there. He had a very pleasant way, when his shyness wore off, of receiving guests. Being so much la fille à papa, he rather over-rated the dignity of the Presidency, and felt too sensitively his nullity as President. He bitterly resented the long furloughs given by General Mercier, and the extreme reticence of M. Hanotaux about foreign affairs. He only knew of what the War Minister had done through a complaint of Baron de Mohrenheim—a step which brought on the Dreyfus affair. The sensitiveness and the notion of official dignity were expressed on his coffin, according to his last spoken wish—the simple Cross of the Legion of Honour, won in an action at l'Hay, near Paris, on September 18, 1870, side by side with the Grand Cross of the same order, which he had worn as President and ex-President of the Republic. M. Carnot, from a mistaken idea of the importance of a very high-class bourgeois President to the Russian Alliance, helped M. Casimir-Perier on towards that post. M. Carnot's time had nearly expired when he fell beneath Caserio's dagger. He had aided in bringing Casimir-Perier to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, the Presidency of the Chamber, and the Premiership, and did his best to make sure of his election to the tip-top Presidency of all. Everything had been at that time made subservient to the Russian Alliance. As the Anzin and Courriers collieries had secured a seven years' contract to coal the Russian Baltic fleet, M. Carnot looked forward to the hearty co-operation of the next President in the alliance policy. M. Casimir-Perier, as Foreign Minister, had signed the first diplomatic convention between France and Russia. Russian influence threw him too decidedly into a course of reaction, then the general course of politicians who had escaped narrowly from the smirch of Panamism and were glad to hang on to the Moderates and to Leo XIII. in the name of "l'esprit nouveau."

M. Casimir-Perier had one great negative defect—no sense of humour. He saw in each skit on himself a crime of lèse majesté. A gamin was arrested and sent before a police magistrate for crying "bow-wow!" as the President passed. He aggravated the offence by saying he did so because he saw in M. Casimir-Perier a resemblance to the dog that sits beside the driver of the market dray. An artisan found himself in a serious scrape for remarking, as he looked at the President's photo that hung in a shop window: "I prefer my own phiz (binette), ugly though it is, to Casimir's." What President Casimir-Perier found most galling and unendurable was the espionage of the police. He could not stir anywhere without being tracked by agents from the Prefecture of Police or the Bureau of Public Safety. Some of them furnished not merely reports to his official chief, but to the newspapers. Visits of consolation to the widow of the President's best friend, who had not been long dead, caused the cup of bitterness to overflow, and the grand bourgeois President left the Elysée in a fit of anger with M. Dupuy, the Prime Minister, and Minister of the Interior. His subsequent life was entirely devoted to the Anzin mines, to leagues against tuberculosis and other diseases, and to schemes for improving the working class millions. He remained to the end in fast friendship with President Loubet. Mme. Casimir-Perier was her husband's first cousin.

Present-day catastrophes have a common character of monotony in their horror. They happen in the twinkling of an eye, and crush tens, or scores, or hundreds or more human beings out of existence, depriving death of all the calm beauty of "the first dark day of nothingness." "The bill of casualties" chiefly deals with mangled corpses, too shattered and torn to pieces to be identified as belonging to any one in particular.

Occasionally some heroic effort gives a tone of grandeur to the gruesome horrors. We find this element in the Iéna catastrophe. But for the grand conduct of men and officers who survived the explosion, the greater part of the fleet and town must have been destroyed. The words in which M. Brisson, as President of the Chamber, spoke of their efforts came, as do most great things, from the heart. A nobler tribute to purposeful martyrdom to duty never had official utterance. So far from being stunned by the appalling situation in which they found themselves, the hell upon earth which raged around them seems to have called into play their finest mental faculties. Moltke said that if the improvised forces of Gambetta obliged the Germans to raise the siege of Paris there would be an end to standing armies. Likewise, may we not find a reason in the explosion of the Iéna to revolutionise naval armaments? The B powder, or melinite—a variety of cordite—is too dangerous to be of much good except to shipbuilders. Its liability to go off of itself renders it the almost certain destroyer of any vessel with a full store in a warm climate. When fresh it lights up easily into flame, but does not explode except when there is a mixture of ordinary gunpowder. Rather curiously, its potentiality cannot appear in explosive force if there be not the "stimulant" of the black powder or of fulminate. Any slight shock can set the latter going.

The first revelation of the destroying force of the picrate of potassium, which is the basis of melinite, took place on the eve of the Franco-German war in the Rue de la Sorbonne. A chemist had a store of that substance by him to use as a yellow dye. In exploding it wrecked nearly the whole street. "Smokeless powder" came out of the explosion, and the whole tactics of modern artillery by land and sea had to adapt themselves to this new discovery. The wonder now is that any great vessel can survive a cruise in a tropical sea or a sojourn in the Port of Toulon. A dry dock there grows like an oven when the weather is at all fine. The ordinary temperature there of the hold of a vessel like the Iéna is 45deg. C. This heat decomposes the melinite and makes it flame. The unavoidable mixture of gunpowder then "irritates," and there is an explosion. Infinitely minute pains are daily taken to test the state of the melinite and to cool the hold where it is stored. The general rule is for vessels, on entering a dry dock, to send their explosives to cold cellars at the arsenal. But in the case of the Iéna this rule had to be set aside so as to admit of a sudden departure for Morocco on an order from Paris.

I knew Admiral Ponty very well when aide of Vice-Admiral Gervais, and commander of the port of Bizerta. I heard him say that anxiety about explosives would kill him, and so it did. It also killed his wife, who had never the courage to read a newspaper until somebody else had looked over it for her and assured her that it contained nothing to shock or alarm her. She had known of too many cases of the spontaneous igniting of melinite stores ever to sleep with an easy mind when the Admiral was at sea. He had the very narrowest escape of being caught in an explosion in the Piræus. The whole Court had come down from Athens to see off some Imperial Russian visitors, and the French man-of-war lay near them. All just missed passing in an instant from time to eternity. But they remained in blissful ignorance of the danger they had run. Admiral Cuverville had in the Admiral Duperré an escape so narrow that he felt he must attribute it to the favour of the Archangel Michael. The melinite ignited spontaneously. A huge wave and a sudden change in the wind cooled the vessel, and drove the flames in a safe direction. The Admiral has lost no opportunity to attribute his escape to this supernatural protection. Another similar accident took place out at sea. Admiral Aube never returned from a cruise in a behemoth steel ship without feeling impelled to return thanks at some Lady shrine.

In scandalising the right-thinking people of la rive gauche, Antoine has made a crock of gold. The scandal lies in his having mounted, at the Odéon, an adaptation of Zola's novel, "La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret." Bruneau, for seventeen years the intimate friend of Zola, furnishes the musical accompaniment, corresponding to that of Mendelssohn in "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It is meant to fill in pauses where words might answer less well than vague and yet suggestive musical harmony and melodious phrases. The word "faute" means "fall" in the Paradise Lost sense. That of the Abbé Mouret is due to the rousing effect on his whole nature of the Provençal garden, or paradou—a real paradise which has been suffered to run wild. Any one who pleases can enter it through a breach in the old crumbling wall. In this Eden, as in the primitive one, the serpent knows how to fit his arguments to fleeting circumstances. There is but one want in this garden, as presented at the Odéon—the want of heady Provençal perfumes. Joussaume, the stage decorator, cannot reproduce the fragrance of those scrubby plants, the sage, mint, southernwood, lavender, thyme, and other labiates which have crowded out the garden flowers and potherbs.

To give a summary of this play would be to serve up a dish of bare bones. Besides, you have the novel to refer to. Antoine, who, if a great artist, likes to take all the money he can out of a stage venture, produces "The Fall of the Abbé Mouret" at matinées as well as at evening representations. The Odéon, which used to be a theatre of empty benches, is now full as it can hold. Perhaps the studious youth of the neighbourhood hardly needed this to stir their passions, or the Catholics round about the play-house to remember they have fallen upon evil days.

That theatre is in the sharp accentuation of two sets of prevailing opinions in the most piebald district of this capital. You have there the Catholic Institute, Saint Sulpice's Church, the devout population which gathered round the monasteries and convents, now closed and for sale under the Combes Law, and then there is the grave Senate at the adjacent Luxembourg. You have, on the other hand, the very godless schools of the Faculties, the Sorbonne, College of France, where Renan used to lecture, the Boulevard St. Michel, the Boule Mich' of the students, with its crowd of free-and-easy lads and lasses from every province of France and country of Europe, not to omit the Japs, and the Chinese, of whom there is quite a settlement sent here to study at the expense of their Government—that is to say, of the old Empress Dowager. All these young people are aggressively unbelieving, and, for the time being, Antoine is one of their divinities.

Of course, the Catholic papers say their worst of "La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret," and the voluptuous music that chimes in with it. Drumont, while admitting that the novel contains magnificent pages, deplores the bad taste which led the adaptor to collect "la crotte et la déjection." This phrase may be taken as the summing up of all the hostile opinions.

We had the mediæval priest—now revived by Sarah Bernhardt—in the villanous Archdeacon Frollo in "Notre Dame de Paris." But he is so absurdly unreal in his immorality and monstrous villany, that no Catholic thinks of taking offence when he stalks the stage. A good many years ago Ludovic Halévy, author of so many Offenbachanalian librettos, delighted the Catholic world with a dear, deliciously mellow curé, l'Abbé Constantin. It did not see that the author, an inveterate Jew, poked a little fun in bestowing on this personage every pleasing virtue he could think of. His object was to enter the Academy, and he succeeded almost at once. The character and whole play are as artificial as "Frou Frou," a drama from the same pen, and just as charming. Coquelin revived it not long ago at the Gaîté, and is now having a second aftermath at another theatre. Those who applauded the dear Abbé overlooked the danger of producing the cassock—in French, soutane—on the stage. To applaud an abbé implies the right to deride him.

We have had, since Halévy entered the Academy, "Le Duel" at the Français, by M. Lavedan, the son of a pious and influential Catholic, and a conforming Catholic himself; "Ces Messieurs," by Ancey, at the Gymnase; "Le Bourgeon" at the Vaudeville, by Georges Feydeau, with Porel as manager and stage manager, and disposed for risky spice; "La Sorcière," with its red Cardinal and inquisitor, at the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt; "La Soutane," by Brenède, at the Théâtre Molière, and "Sainte Thérèse" at the Sarah Bernhardt. That poetic drama is a betrayal with a kiss, but, to the innocent or voluntarily blind Society Catholics, less disrespectful to the church than the Bishop of Avila thinks it.

Dramatic authors must please the Parisiennes. If they do not like a play it has no run. How best please them? In showing their irresistible power over the other sex, "la soutane sur la scène" now takes. But that garment must be worn by a priest who is possessed by a maddening passion for some fair parishioner or secularised nun. Had the Bishop of Laval been fifteen years younger at the time of his adventure with the Carmelite abbess, he would have been an attractive character in a Vaudeville or a Gymnase play. Under one pretence or another all the fashionably religious people went to see "Le Bourgeon" at the Vaudeville. The author, perhaps anticipating this, had made the principal personage a tonsured divinity student merely. The sight of a cocotte bathing on the strand of Paramé kills his vocation for a professionally religious life. In "Ces Messieurs," the village curé trembles from terror when a rosy-cheeked and dimpled devotee accosts him and seems to desire spiritual direction. This, of course, is blague, but flattering blague to the taste of the Parisienne. A priest finding a motive for action in avarice or ambition would never fill a house with an elegant audience. He must be lost in love. A virtuous priest, with a mind illumined with heavenly light and a heart warmed with charity, could not fail to set a Parisian audience yawning.

The latest taking horror in the way of a soutane—the word is used figuratively—is "La Tentation de l'Abbé Jean," by M. Payen, now on at the Théâtre Moderne, where it replaces that droll "La Puce dans l'Oreille," at which the King laughed so continuously and heartily. I think I had better not analyse it, as the author has evidently the adventure in his mind of the Abbé Delarue and Marie Fremont, but with a different end. The Abbé Delarue has been undergoing the severest penances in a Tyrol monastery, spat upon, and treated with every contumely by the monks, and is under orders to proceed to Northern Canada. The dénouement of "La Tentation de l'Abbé Jean" is this: As with sobs and groans he confesses his adventure with Louise Gallin, a secularised sister, to his venerable mother, Louise's mother enters to call on the Abbé to make an honest woman of her daughter by a marriage in extremis. This is so well played to shock that it brings down the house. Village life in France is amusingly and truly represented in this play. It is not always edifying, but the peasants represented have their good points and even virtues. M. Payen seems to advocate the marriage of the priest. Most dramatic authors who busy themselves with the soutane now do. With an inconsistency that hardly any one notices, they are for minimising in the cases of laics the matrimonial tie almost to non-existence. If they succeed, that tie will be too completely useless for any layman to be at the trouble of incurring it. The only marriages at mayoralties will then, perhaps, be those of priests who have broken with the Church.

A PEER ON POPULARITY.

JESSIE says that she is quite sure you won't stand it if I write any more about myself, and that I really must write a topical article this week. She says, too, that she is inclined to think it would be more dignified. As a matter of fact, I believe it is really her mother, Mrs. Perks, who has been making a fuss about it to her. Mrs. Perks is very strict in her ideas, and I understand that it was one of the bitterest blows in her life when Jessie got a place in the chorus, instead of going as what they call a 'tweeny maid—some sort of a housemaid, Jessie tells me—in the family where Mrs. Perks used to be cook before she married. And although when Jessie got on so wonderfully through being brought out as an American beauty she got more reconciled to things, and even tried to learn the American accent, so as to keep "in the picture," as Jessie says, she never went down to the theatre with her without taking some sort of a tract and trying to convert Jessie's dresser while she was waiting for her in her dressing-room. I don't believe she ever succeeded, though. Then again, Mrs. Perks was horribly cut up about it when Jessie got engaged to me, because she is very religious in some sort of queer Nonconformist way, and, to use her own words, sits under some preacher—I forget his name, but his chapel is somewhere near Westbourne-grove, and his sermons are chiefly about Passive Resistance and the Abolition of the House of Lords. She has sort of gathered the idea from him that all peers are quite unspeakable, and that all the curses in the Old Testament against the heathen were meant for them; and it was one of her ambitions that Jessie should marry a minister of some kind. She has come round more or less now, I am glad to say. The first time I realised it was one day when she told me that her husband had been a colonel in the army, though Jessie had already told me, when I first asked her to marry me, as one of the reasons why she oughtn't to, that he was a private in a line regiment, and a bad little hat at that. That is one of the things I admire Jessie for so much: she is about the only woman I ever knew who tells me the exact truth about things.

Anyway, it was Mrs. Perks didn't like my writing about Jessie and myself, now that every one knows who I am. She says it shows a want of dignity; and Jessie is so thoroughly good to her mother, and lets her have her own way about nearly everything—it is another of the things I admire her so much for—so, of course, I shall have to humour her. We have both tried very hard to think of a subject. I do wish, by the way, you would have used my article on the Suffragettes last week; I think it was quite one of the best I have ever done—and so does Jessie. We hit on the Boat Race at last, not because I know any more about it than any one else, though I had a cousin in the Cambridge boat this year—I never was a wet-bob myself—but because it is the sort of thing the newspapers always make no end of a fuss about whenever it comes round, and I thought you would like to have something new about it.

It has always struck me that there is more piffle written about the Boat Race than about almost anything else, and now, at last, by reading all the papers and looking up their back numbers and things, I believe I have found out why it is, and I expect it will surprise you when I tell you. It is because it helps them to fill up a lot of pages for nothing—or nearly. I find that all of them give a map of the course of some kind—every year—so of course it doesn't cost them a penny, because they keep the plate, or whatever you call it, in stock. And then they all give a sort of table, showing the races and who won them from the beginning. Of course, they have got that in stock, too, and all they have to do is to add one line for last year's race on to the bottom, which can't cost them much. Then they have a lot of long articles that have been written about the race for years and years, and that are all as nearly as possible word for word the same; so they just change a word here and there and use them up again, and, of course, do not have to pay any one for writing others. Most of them get nearly a page a day, for weeks perhaps, that costs them nothing, and they must save no end over it. Of course, you cannot blame them, but it does make me smile to read all the nonsense they hash up about the perennial popularity of the Boat Race, and the reasons they give for it, when all the while they know that they make it themselves in order to economise. Of course, when people read so much about it for days before, and about the thousands that are going to see it, they just go there because of the others that they are told are going, just as they would go to anything else that was so well advertised. In fact, it only shows you how powerful an advertisement can be, because they all know that not one in a thousand of them will see anything of the race at all, and the rest will just see two boats going along the river not nearly so fast as a motor-'bus, with a lot of very warm young men rowing in them, and only see that for about three seconds.

But it is the reasons that the papers give you for its popularity that are really so screaming. They say it is because it is the only really honest piece of rowing we have left. Perhaps it is. But do you suppose that if you took eighteen of the biggest scoundrels whose names you put in your Cautionary List and set them to row a race, and gave up columns and columns to it in all the papers for days beforehand, you would not get just as big crowds on the tow-path as you do now, or bigger? And then they say that the Boat Race is popular because it is rowed by real amateurs, who are absolutely untainted by professionalism. Then I suppose they would say that the Derby would be more popular if you had amateurs up instead of professional jockeys, or that you would get bigger crowds to see a billiard match for amateurs than between Stevenson and Reece. I could write no end to show you that it is all nonsense what they write about the perennial popularity, and I should just like to give you one illustration. Supposing something really exciting happened just before the Boat Race day—if Ireland was destroyed by an earthquake, or the Kaiser declared war upon us—so that the papers just had to fill their columns with it, and had not got room to write about the race at all; how many people do you think would go and see it? I wonder.

The real truth of the matter is that the Boat Race is only popular because the papers find it pays them to make it so. And it will go on being popular just as long as it does pay them and no longer. It only shows you what a lot of power a journalist has, and it is one of the things that makes me feel glad I became one instead of going into partnership with a cousin of mine in an S.P. Turf commission house, as I had some thought of doing. That is all I have to say about the Boat Race, and I hope you will like it, because I rather think it is quite the best article I have written for you yet. And so does Jessie.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE middle-aged, middle-sized, middle-class man, dear Lady Betty, is the most perfect human product in modern England. The type represents security—a quality which is much valued by our cat-hearted generation. The old suburban Englishwoman expressed the sentiments of her fellow-countrymen accurately when she said: "'There is nothing new under the sun'; we have much to be thankful for!"

The lady was not altogether correct; there is the New Brilliancy.

Sparkling scandal appears to be the most approved form of this.

"Any news?"

"No. Everything is very dull. Old Jones is ruined." (With an appreciatory smile): "Is he? No more dinners! Anything else?"

"Nothing; except that Smith is dying."

"Well, you are not brilliant to-day! Good-bye."

A little divorce would have made all the difference; the conversation would then have attained brilliancy.

. . . . .

A "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Words" should at once be founded. There are now a multitude of words and phrases that are being abominably ill-treated every moment of the day in this country, and amongst them especially are "brilliant," "society," "cynical," and "smartness." From shopping in the West End to supping with a prospective co-respondent at an expensive restaurant seems to be the area covered by "society" in the suburban and provincial minds, and the least disapproval of conventional circumstances in contemporary life is "cynicism." From committing a substantial fraud with impunity to being the figure-head of Fashion is "smartness"—limits which include some of the flashes of Shakespeare and the facetiousness of an omnibus conductor.

* * * * *

The rage for the "smart" in this country shows no sign of abating. It corresponds to the demand for spurious jewellery, imitation furs, and false finery, and is the outcome of the same circumstances.

In our Parliament of to-day the members do not appreciate oratory, stimulating speech, or even argument, but "smart" retort, and affronts "smartly" masked so as to avoid the censure of the Speaker.

In the literature of the time we do not look for imagination, originality, thought, style, or even instruction, but "smart" inconsistencies, and affectations that appear "smart" to the inexperienced. On the stage it is not elaborate plots, careful studies of character or wit, but "smart" dialogue—butterfly-phrases—"smart" dresses, and "smart" actors and actresses that our public wants.

It is not the good, but the "smart," woman we admire, the woman who has the phonographic mind in the phonographic body, both reproducing the conventionalities which at the moment are described as "smart." It is not the great, but the "smart," man that is popular in "society."

It is not good dressing that is attempted, but "smart" dressing.

The business man does not glory in his honesty and industry, but in his "smartness"—the capacity for overreaching his neighbour.

We have "smart" sermons, "smart" vices, and "smart" Good Samaritanism!

The Actress Apostle is a character that it has been reserved for our generation to develop. The profligate peer, baronet, or "gentleman" of the past who married an actress generally ended his career as a bankrupt and a drunkard. The rake who marries an actress now generally retires to the country, behaves respectably, retrenches, and leads an altogether happy and exemplary life. It is the "society" wife in the England of to-day who drives her husband to the gaming table, drink, debt, and divorce! Those are not accidental circumstances. The "lady" of to-day in this country has often no higher ambition than to model herself on the pattern of the actress, as she imagines the latter to be, and, consequently, adopts many failings which are on the surface of stage life, or are supposed to be always associated with it. On the other hand, the modern actress is not the outcast her predecessors generally were, and her endeavour is to model herself on the pattern of the "lady" as she imagines the latter to be; and, consequently, when well-settled, she adopts many virtues which are commonly supposed to be inseparable from the "lady-like" character. Many an actress, moreover, has suffered, has toiled, has struggled—these are great educating circumstances for the heart. Most "society" women in England have not had these advantages.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE late Lord Penrhyn had been an owner of racehorses and steeplechasers for forty-seven years, but he was not elected to the Jockey Club until 1887. During his father's lifetime he raced under the name of "Mr. Moreton," and for some years he was in partnership with Lord Coventry. His attention was then principally directed to cross-country events. He won many important hurdle races and steeplechases with animals of his own breeding, but he never succeeded in carrying off the Grand National Steeplechase. For that race he had a great favourite in 1873 in Footman, but Disturbance won, and thereby retrieved the then shattered fortunes of Captain Machell, whose circumstances at that particular juncture were most critical and precarious. According to his own account, he won £30,000 over the race, and the owner of Footman had stood to win £16,000 over his horse. "Mr. Moreton" had a very smart filly early in the seventies in Perfume, a daughter of Buccaneer. She was a fine performer in T.Y.C. races. "Mr. Moreton," who trained with Weever at Bourton-on-the-Water, was intimately associated in his racing affairs with his brother-in-law, the late Sir Charles Rushout, and with his intimate friends, the late Mr. T. T. Drake and his brother, the Rev. Edward Drake ("Mr. Ekard"), the well-known and very popular rector of Amersham. In those days "Mr. Moreton" sometimes betted heavily, but he was singularly sagacious in his plunges, and when he put down his money in earnest he usually picked it up again, whether he was backing his own horse or somebody else's. He was an excellent judge of racing. In 1887, a year after his father's death, Lord Penrhyn placed his racehorses under the management of Mr. E. C. Clayton, who soon got together a useful stud. Noble Chieftain was one of the smartest horses in training over short courses, and Red Palmer (a daughter of Perfume), Robin Hood, Quæsitum, King's Messenger, Peroration, and Harefield all carried his colours successfully. Lord Penrhyn won the Chester Cup and the Ascot Vase with Quæsitum, and King's Messenger carried off the Goodwood Cup and (twice) the Great Metropolitan Handicap at Epsom. This horse was bought by Lord Penrhyn after he had won a selling race at Goodwood, and his brilliant successes induced his owner to speculate afterwards in other platers, but with no very satisfactory results. Lord Penrhyn was a regular attendant at the great meetings of the year, and a constant habitué of Newmarket. He was once invited to accept the office of Steward of the Jockey Club, but declined, on the ground that he was fully occupied with the management of his own private affairs, and had no time to spare for Newmarket business. He raced for sport alone, and the starting of his horses was never influenced by any considerations connected with betting. As to Lord Penrhyn's hunting career, there certainly was no more popular M.F.H. in England during the nine years that he presided over the Grafton country, and it is no exaggeration to assert that he was really beloved by the farmers. Lord Penrhyn's family are now represented in the Jockey Club by his son-in-law, Lord Falmouth, in whose horses the late peer took a most keen interest. He was delighted some years ago by the successes of Quintessence, and had looked forward to seeing St. Martin distinguish himself this season. His death has deprived the Turf of a familiar, stately, and honoured figure, and it is a loss which will be lamented by all who knew him.

The racing season has this year commenced a week sooner than usual, owing to the early Easter. After this week there will be no sport of any general interest until the Newmarket Craven Meeting (April 16), except at the Kempton Park Easter Meeting. The first of the Newmarket fixtures is immediately followed by Derby on April 19 and 20. The next week is practically divided between Epsom and Sandown Park, for the sport at Pontefract and Stockton will be of only local interest. Newmarket First Spring begins on April 30, so the Two Thousand will be run on May 1, and the One Thousand on the 3rd. The next week is divided between Chester and Kempton Park, and then (May 14) comes the Newmarket Second Spring, followed by a two days' fixture at Gatwick. Whitsun Monday comes on May 20, and there are seven meetings during the holiday week, the only important ones being Hurst Park and Manchester. The week before Epsom Summer has Harpenden (on Monday), Bath, and Salisbury in the south, and York and Doncaster in the north, with a one-day meeting at Hurst Park on Saturday, which might surely have been dispensed with. There is this year an interval of five weeks between the Newmarket First Spring week and Epsom, so the Derby will be run on June 5, and the Oaks on the 7th. The Stewards of the Jockey Club are perfectly infatuated about one-day Saturday fixtures, which are detested by owners, trainers, and jockeys. Four days at Epsom will surely satisfy the most insatiable appetite for sport, without that meeting being followed by a Saturday orgie at Kempton Park, and there is the same idiotic arrangement in Ascot week, the Saturday being given over to Windsor. Lingfield and Hurst Park (again!) are the best of the five fixtures in the week after Epsom. Ascot begins on June 18. It is greatly to be regretted that there should have been a return to the old, stupid, and most objectionable arrangement of letting only one week intervene between Epsom and Ascot. The last week of June has five meetings, the best being Gatwick, Newcastle, and Sandown Park. Newmarket First July comes on July 2, and the next week is given up to the Bibury Club Meeting at Stockbridge and Lingfield Park. It is simply preposterous that the Bibury Club Meeting should be allowed to drag over three days, for the programme barely justifies a second day, unless it is to be considerably enriched this year. Newmarket Second July (July 16) is followed by the Sandown Park Eclipse Meeting.

EASTER HOLIDAYS.—DIEPPE CASINO. 5 hours from London. Open March 28 to April 1 inclusive. Unrivalled pleasure centre. Concerts, Plays, Balls, Petits Chevaux, Baccarat, &c.

The week before Goodwood has Liverpool and Newbury. It is provoking to find such flagrant folly as an allotment of three days to Liverpool, the result being that there is a clashing with Newbury, to the great damage of both meetings. Goodwood comes on July 30, and then there is the customary sequence of fixtures until Doncaster, which begins on September 10. This year there is an interval of three weeks (instead of the usual fortnight) between Doncaster and the Newmarket First October Meeting, which begins on October 1. The result of this muddling is that the Houghton Meeting does not begin until October 29, so that all the "back-end" fixtures have to be crammed and jammed into three weeks instead of them being allowed the usual term of four weeks. The authorities certainly move in mysterious ways in making their arrangements. Liverpool is again grossly favoured, for there is no justification whatever for allowing this meeting to draggle on over four days when only three are granted to Derby and Manchester. The only alteration in the November arrangements is that Newbury has been granted a one-day fixture, being the Wednesday in the closing week of the season, when this meeting is rammed in between Warwick and Manchester. It would be difficult for the most vigorous imagination to conceive a more thoroughly inconvenient arrangement for everybody concerned—owners, trainers, jockeys, public, bookmakers, and Turf camp-followers. The season will close on Saturday, November 23.

The St. Leger has hitherto been a sweepstakes of £25 each, but next year the race will be of the value of £6,500, the new conditions being precisely the same as those of the Derby. There are 329 entries, as compared with 182 for this year, while last year there were 188. It is premature, however, to describe the St. Leger of 1908 as a pecuniary success, for the amount of the subscription from owners mainly depends upon the number of animals which are withdrawn when the minor forfeit is declared on the 26th. His Majesty heads the list of owners with five entries, but the largest subscriber is Sir John Robinson, who is represented by eleven of the Worksop Manor yearlings, which were sold at Doncaster in September, and next comes Mr. L. de Rothschild with ten, and then Lord Rosebery with eight, this last lot including a half-brother to Cicero, by Sir Visto, a half-brother to Traquair, by St. Frusquin, and an own brother to Lavengro. Sir R. Waldie-Griffith, Mr. Arthur James, the Duke of Portland, and Mr. W. Hall Walker have seven entries each, and the Duke of Westminster and Lord Derby have six each. As the profits from the races at Doncaster are devoted to the benefit of the ratepayers of the town, it is quite certain that, in the event of the St. Leger proving a failure from the pecuniary point of view, there would be a vigorous agitation there for a return to the old conditions. I do not believe that the increased value of the stakes will ever bring an additional starter to the post, and nobody can desire to see a classic race contested by a large field of bad horses. It would have been more to the purpose if the Stewards of the Jockey Club had recommended the managers of the meeting to increase the value of their principal two-year-old races, notably the Champagne Stakes and the Rous Plate.

A paragraph has appeared in several papers stating that the best of M. E. Blanc's two-year-olds is a colt by Mackintosh, who is alleged to be considerably in front of the numerous sons and daughters of Flying Fox. I presume that reference is made to Imperméable, colt out of Isola. The story of his superiority is obviously rubbish and balderdash. Who ever heard of a large stud of two-year-olds being seriously galloped in February, and especially in France, where these animals are not allowed to run before August. It would be surprising if M. E. Blanc entertained any idea of a real trial of his two-year-olds for the next four months at least.

Sir Ernest Cassel's Araminta, half-sister, by Ayrshire, to Spearmint, is described to me as a nice racing-like filly, with excellent action, but she is decidedly small. Araminta, who cost 3,500 gs. as a yearling at Doncaster last September, has no fewer than forty-eight engagements, the first of which is the Great Surrey Foal Stakes at the Epsom Summer Meeting, and she is also in the Acorn Stakes there. At Ascot she is entered for both the Coventry Stakes and the New Stakes.

Lord Derby's colt, Olympian, is third favourite for the Derby at 10 to 1, but I would be sorry for any one who took 100 to 1 about him unless a start was given. Olympian is a heavy colt, and he wants a lot of time. Of all the three-year-olds now in training he is about the last that any one would select as likely to distinguish himself over the Epsom gradients. He will probably prove a troublesome horse to train. He has a nice engagement at Hurst Park on June 15 (the Saturday before Ascot) in the Duchess of York Plate of £1,000 to the winner, as he has no penalty.

Colonel Baird's colt Woolwinder is a most promising Derby outsider, and he will probably be found a profitable colt to follow, even if he fails at Epsom. It is, however, preposterously fatuous to speculate on the Derby at present. Nobody can tell as yet whether the animals which have been backed will get through their preparations all right, and their stamina has been entirely taken upon trust. Every year there are so-called Derby colts whose early gallops throw beholders into paroxysms of enthusiasm, but when these animals come to be seriously galloped they stop "dead" at the end of five or six furlongs.

His Majesty's colours are not likely to be seen prominently in either the Derby or the Oaks, although he has four colts left in for the former race and three fillies for the latter event. Slim Lad dreadfully disappointed the Egerton House stable last autumn after he had been well tried, and it is improbable that he will ever be of any use on the Turf except in moderate company and when running over short courses. Perambulator, the dark colt by Persimmon out of Spyglass, obviously wants plenty of time, and he is not likely to be really in thorough racing condition before the end of the summer. It might be decided to keep this colt for the Jockey Club Stakes at the Newmarket First October Meeting if he turns out to be a stayer. He has some good engagements at Ascot, and he was left in for the Eclipse Stakes, but it would be unwise to hurry him on in his training.

The Crawfurd Plate at the Newmarket Craven Meeting, which originally failed to fill, has obtained only twenty-three entries, a truly miserable subscription, considering that the value is £300, and the liability only £4, the race being run over the popular B.S.C.

The Stewards' Handicap of £1,000 at the Kempton Park Spring Meeting, has only thirty-five entries, and, inasmuch as the distance is five furlongs, this is an even worse subscription than that for the Newmarket event, considering the increased value of the race. The class is good, as the entry includes Rising Falcon, His Eminence, Ulalume, Cyanean, Traquair, Saxham, Rocketter, Hexagon, Nero, Lally, and Bill of the Play. It is significant that Traquair has been entered for such a race as this. He need not be thought of for a moment in connection with the Two Thousand or Derby.

Lord Rosebery paid a visit to Newmarket last week, accompanied by Lord Dalmeny, and three of his two-year-olds were ignominiously defeated in a trial with Trunnion over half a mile. These animals were Chattan, filly by Ladas out of Catronia; Lucian, by Velasquez out of Sister Lucy; and Sirmio, filly by Ladas out of Apennine.

At Liverpool, to-morrow, Mr. Arthur James is likely to win the Molyneux Stakes with Attraction, colt by Ladas out of Charm, who has been well galloped at Newmarket. Slieve Gallion will not run for the Union Jack Stakes of £1,200, and it is expected at Newmarket that Sir E. Cassel's Freeborn will win this race, and it is probable that Mr. Hall Walker's Knight of Tully will prove to be his most dangerous opponent. Succour is a strong tip from Newmarket for the Spring Cup, and he is described as being quite fit and in excellent form.

On Friday, it is likely that the Sefton Park Plate will be won by Mr. J. Wallace's St. Elf, half-brother, by St. Maclou, to Gnome, who has been highly tried at Newmarket. An excellent judge of steeplechasing informs me that, in his opinion, the Grand National will be won by Hercules II, and that this horse should be backed both to win and for a place.

There will be racing next week at Nottingham on two days, but after Friday there is not likely to be any sport of general interest before the Kempton Park Meeting on Easter Monday.

The minor forfeits for a great number of races are to be declared on Tuesday next, and there will doubtless be an extensive weeding of the entries for the Derby and Oaks of 1908.

THE WASTRELS OF THE C.T.C.

I said last week that the Council of the C.T.C. had resolved to have a postal vote in order to challenge the results of the poll at the general meeting of the club, which adopted a resolution by the Hon. Gilbert Coleridge, pressing for reform in the secretarial and editorial offices. It is not until the history and constitution of the club is studied that the public can learn the remarkable character of the institution that they are invited to join. Properly organised, it is a corporation capable of doing a great deal of good. As it is run at present, there is a tremendous expenditure for practically no results. The balance-sheet for the year shows a reserve fund of £20,600, an income from subscriptions of £7,483, and an expenditure of £4,667 on office expenses alone, excluding altogether the expenses of the Gazette, which is published once a month, and is run at a loss of £1,923 a year, notwithstanding that its advertisements bring in £2,285 a year, which sum ought to be added to income.

Now, the club recently attempted to enlarge its borders by taking in all tourists. The effort failed. The opponents of the scheme were not called upon by Mr. Justice Warrington to argue their case. The case the Council put forward was in effect that the present privileges of the members could not be retained, and that all the councillors save one held the view that the club must be broadened if it is to retain its power and influence. This is the view, not only of the Council, but also of Mr. Shipton, who fulfils the duties of editor and secretary. With all the money it has at its back, and with the enormous income it possesses, such an admission is incomprehensible, unless it be that the club is in the hands of people as incompetent as the statement of affairs shows they are extravagant. These persons, who have admitted the impossibility of conducting the club on its present lines, and who have squandered the club's funds on a Chancery suit, in which their admissions have been published to the world, are the very people who are fighting tooth and nail against the resolution passed by a considerable majority at the general meeting, demanding reorganisation and reform in the editorial and secretarial departments. Having employed the machinery of the law courts to advertise their failures, they now have the effrontery to seek the support of the members and the public in their efforts to run the club on its present lines. I doubt if either the public or the members realise the extent to which they are in the hands of these councillors and their secretary-cum-editor, Mr. Shipton. Nor do they appreciate the extent to which the machinery of the club is used to stifle reform and thwart those who are anxious to run the club as an institution commanding the support and respect of cyclists. Every member of the club will be well advised to support the reform resolution carried at the general meeting. They will be told that only 300 voted and that only thirty was the majority. They must remember that this was a big meeting, as meetings of the C.T.C. go, and that their secretary, Mr. Shipton, recently sent out 2,000 circulars for a special meeting in order, as he said, to secure a quorum of ten. They must not forget that the councillors, some forty of them, were present, and voted in the minority. They need to be reminded that their councillors in effect get their railway fares paid to attend their meetings because a council meeting is always held on the same or next day, and for council meetings the councillors' fares are paid by the club. For instance, Mr. Kendall Barnett, the chairman, gets his trip from Aberdeen to London paid by the club. He attended eight out of nine council meetings last year. One was held in Edinburgh, two in Manchester, one at Newcastle, and four in London. So he got a nice lot of travelling for nothing.

Now the club members elect their councillors, thirty-three in number, for their respective divisions. How many voting papers are received I do not know. Probably members let matters slide. These councillors elect chief consuls who, from their members, select a number of councillors equal in number to the representative councillors. It will thus be seen that the majority of the representative council determined on a certain course of policy can, by their nomination of chief consuls, secure a solid support of thirty-three votes. The whole procedure is a farce. Once elected, the members have no chance of coercing or correcting their representatives, who can play ducks and drakes with the club as, on their own admission, they have done in the past and apparently intend to do in the future.

Having once been elected they then have the power of demanding a poll of the club on any resolution passed at a general meeting, or they may demand a special general meeting. For this purpose fifteen councillors need only sign the requisition. If the members desire such a privilege 200 must sign the request. Thus fifteen councillors demanded a poll on Mr. Coleridge's resolution. As a counterblast Mr. Coleridge must get 200 members to sign a request for a general meeting, which, be it noted, must be held at a town 100 miles away from the town where the last meeting was held, and such town must contain 200,000 inhabitants, and such meeting must be held within four months of the previous one, and then, if it confirms the resolutions at the previous meeting, the council is bound thereby. It is obvious that the council would never require two such meetings to confirm its own policy. The policy of the members, if hostile to the council, can only be of any value if confirmed by a fresh meeting a hundred miles away, to which it may be impossible for the members to travel. This will not affect the councillors, who will arrange a council meeting and have their fares paid. But fancy Londoners going to Birmingham in order to vote. They would waste more time and money than the thing is worth. It is better to resign the club. And that is precisely what people are doing in their thousands each year. Over three thousand joined last year, but more than three thousand threw the club over. It is this steady drain on the club that is the surest testimony to the incompetence of the present management. Every credit is due to those who are fighting the battle of Reform. I shall return to this subject and show how difficult it is for the club members to organise, and what unfair means the council adopt in order to gull the members to support them.

The Sportsman points out that Mr. Willis, the Oxford coach, was a fine heavy-weight oarsman, who by some strange accident never got his Blue at the University. Perhaps my well-informed contemporary will kindly say what sort of accident prevents a man who does not go up to the University from getting a Blue. Captain Willis did not go up to either University.

The Daily Mail and the Evening News had stated that Cambridge had decided to ignore the Oxford crew and go for record. Happily it is the press and not the undergraduate who has changed in character. The Cambridge men are not braggarts. From idle boast and foolish word it is hopeless to expect certain journalists to be saved. But then Cambridge were the progressives of the race, and bad habits will show themselves. It was a dull afternoon, the weather inclined to provide drizzle, but just a ray of sun at the start. There was a strong westerly wind, with a touch of south, that meant on a good flood fast times to Hammersmith and afterwards in Corney Reach a dead row and a regular sea. Oxford won the toss and the Surrey shore, and if they could keep the station as far as Chiswick they would give the Light Blues a dusting in the rough water long before both would have to face it. Mr. Pitman, who started, preferred a megaphone to firearms. There was no chopping the start—Cambridge at thirty-nine, and Oxford one less in the whole minute. Stuart put in nearly eleven strokes in the first quarter, but he dropped the rate, and for ever after Oxford rowed the faster stroke. The first mile was fast, and at the end of four minutes Cambridge were a clear length ahead. They were well steered, and took the shelter of the Surrey shore at Hammersmith three lengths ahead. By Chiswick Church, Oxford had spurted and gained a length, and Cambridge were well within themselves, for the worst was coming. As they crossed for Barnes Bridge there was a huge sea raging. Both crews splashed a good deal, but they simply could not help it. Their watermanship was excellent. Oxford in mid-stream had the worst time. They sadly needed the leg-drive of the Cambridge crew. At Barnes Bridge the Light Blues were twenty seconds ahead. They had both had a bad time in the rough water, but Cambridge could take a breather, and so they finished up fresher than Oxford, who were quite rowed out, but had kept their form. Cambridge won by four and a half lengths, and the time was twenty minutes twenty-six seconds, which was very fast considering the conditions after Hammersmith.

There was really a good game of Rugby football at Blackheath. England met Scotland and was beaten, but the forwards played a sterling game. The weakness was at half-back. Public opinion was against that selection. It is a thousand pities that the forwards and three-quarters were not picked earlier, with a couple of half-backs from the metropolis. Then England would not have been wooden spoon. Simpson's try for Scotland was a grand effort, which would have failed against any but unintelligent provincial halves. The game is not dead in England.

The answers of the Council of the Football Association were satisfactory, and they were well received by the amateurs who may now form their federation. This body will be able to represent amateur interests directly as the Football League and Southern League represent the interests of the managers of professional teams. Those two bodies are already ventilating the wage-limit and amount of transfer fees.

Perplexed Stock Markets—The Unnerving Effect of the Yankee Débacle—A Troublous Settlement—Six Failures—A Week-End Revival—The Position of Consols.

ANOTHER week of anxiety has been spent by the Stock Exchange, the collapse that occurred in the American market on Wednesday and Thursday leaving members for a time quite bewildered. While the wild scenes of excitement reported as prevailing in Wall Street found no reflection here—because of the small speculative position open on local account—fears that the liquidation in New York might bring down houses this side having American connections gave rise to a nervous sentiment, and the spread of all sorts of rumours about people being in trouble. Naturally, in the circumstances, prices of securities fell away all round, to an extent out of proportion to the actual sales. So far as the London Stock Exchange is concerned, the Settlement was not completed without the announcement of six failures. One was that of an old-established firm of brokers, in a fairly large way of business; but the others were of no general importance, and in one case the defaulter was a plunger whose disappearance from the House will be welcomed as the removal of a source of danger to the general body of members. In New York, however, which has been the storm centre, it is really remarkable that not a single Stock Exchange failure was announced last week. Seeing that stocks for two days in succession were simply thrown out regardless of price, and that in the case of Union Pacific the quotation dropped 25 per cent. in a few hours, this immunity from disclosed trouble is a striking proof of the small extent to which the American public—as well as the British public—was in the recent gamble. The public, indeed, appears at last to have had its eyes opened to the unscrupulous methods of certain mushroom millionaire speculators, and, as was the case in 1903, has compelled these gentry to unload upon themselves. The very violence of the fall in Yankees made a reaction inevitable, and, helped by the monetary relief measures of the United States Treasury, prices turned sharply upwards at the end of the week, the Wall Street rally, of course, being reflected here upon markets generally.

A good deal of comment was aroused last week by the further drop in Consols, which at one time touched 84⅝. The decline was eagerly seized upon by certain unscrupulous critics as a text to found a tirade against the alleged socialistic intentions of the Government. To those who have followed recent financial history there is no need to enter into details of the causes that have brought down Consols and other high class investment securities, or to say that they are of a nature quite beyond the control of the powers that be at Westminster. For instance, can the Government be held responsible for the two great wars fought in the last seven years? for the drain upon the international money market occasioned by those wars? for the world-wide trade activity that has followed in the wake of peace, and for the enormously increased monetary requirements occasioned by this commercial revival? for the over speculation indulged in by New York and for the borrowings of American capitalists here, which have given to the States an awkward hold over our gold stocks? or for the long absence of an effective national Sinking Fund? Yet these factors account almost entirely for the unsatisfactory state of the Consol Market during recent years and at the present moment. As for the gloomy talk indulged in because Consols last week dipped to the lowest level since 1848, it is not necessary to remind most people that the Funds are now on a 2½ per cent. basis as compared with 3 per cent. ruling down to 1888, and 2¾ per cent. between 1888 and 1903, and, therefore, to compare the existing price with any year prior to 1903 is of no practical value. A 2½ per cent. stock at 85 is equivalent to a 2¾ per cent. stock at 93½. and to a 3 per cent. stock at 102. Seeing that French Three per cent. Rentes are quoted at 95 and German Threes at 84, it will be seen that British credit is still paramount among the nations—despite all the powerful adverse influences of a temporary character that have been at work.

Home Rails Steadier—The Bargain Hunter in Evidence—The Traffic Record—Stocks that Look Cheap—The North British Report.

Considering the bad example set by the Consol and other markets Home Rails last week displayed a very steady appearance, and it looked as if the attention given to this department by the genuine investor was at last beginning to tell. The market was assisted, no doubt, by the scarcity of stock for delivery at the last settlement, a matter which was reflected in rather easier carry-over rates. But the real impulse arose from the publication of another batch of very fine traffic returns, which, read in conjunction with the comparatively high yields now available upon the best stocks, naturally

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

* Six weeks.

The increases displayed by the leading goods carriers are the more noteworthy as they occur on top of heavy gains a year ago. It will be observed that the North-Western, the Midland, and the North-Eastern each have advances to date of over £70,000, which is a very good performance for ten weeks. The yields on the three junior stocks of these lines work out at about 4½ per cent., with rather more in the case of Berwicks. At current prices, therefore, there is something to be said for a lock-up of either. The Great Northern is making good headway, and allowing for the growth in traffics and the saving that should accrue this year under the heading of "compensation" because of the loss incurred in 1906 over the Grantham disaster, the deferred stock is one of the leading attractions among the low-priced stocks. On the basis of last year's dividend of 1⅞ per cent., the yield at the current price of just over 40 is 4⅜ per cent. Assuming the dividend for 1907 be 2 per cent., which is not unreasonable, the yield to a present purchaser would be 4⅞ per cent. The Hull and Barnsley, the stock of which line I recommended a week or two ago, is forging ahead at a wonderful pace. Relatively to its size this little "coaler" is doing better at the present time than any other line in the country, its gross gain of £16,000 for ten weeks being equal to more than 17 per cent. As the stock returns fully 4¾ per cent. at the present price, I look for it to lead the way in any market improvement. There is, as I have previously mentioned, a new capital issue to be taken into consideration, but the growth of the line is so rapid, and moreover it has been so continuous for a number of years, that this need not deter the prospective purchaser. This is the dividend story for the last five years:—1902 ½ per cent., 1903 1 per cent., 1904 1¼ per cent., 1905 1⅞ per cent., 1906 2¼ per cent. In addition to the attractions of the stock as a dividend earner, there is always the possibility of the line being taken over by one of its larger neighbours, a matter which would doubtless be preceded by a speculative advance on the prospect of favourable absorption terms.

The Furness might be quoted as another example of a small line whose stocks give a generous return. The recovery in the iron trade of the last two years has revolutionised the fortunes of the Furness; in 1904 the times were so bad that the dividend fell to ¾ per cent. The trade revival enabled the company last year to pay 3 per cent., which was the best return since 1900, when the stockholders received 3½. The line, depending almost entirely upon the iron and steel trade, is of course, subject to greater ups and downs than others enjoying a well-distributed traffic, but a yield of 5 per cent., which is the current return, is not to be despised, particularly as earnings continue on the up grade. In the Southern passenger group, South-Western issues have been picked up lately in anticipation of the benefits that are likely to be reaped in connection wth the development of Southampton Port. Messrs. Harland and Wolff have made a tentative proposal to erect a large ship and engineering works at Southampton, the project being, of course, connected with the forthcoming removal to the southern port of White Star liners, and this matter, if it comes to a practical issue, must have a material bearing upon the traffics of the South-Western later on. Brighton issues have steadied after their recent severe tumble, and the market seems now inclined to await and see whether better weather and the improved facilities for handling traffic that will accrue from the electrification of the South London line and the rebuilding of Victoria Station do put a different complexion upon earnings. Mr. William Forbes, the general manager of the company, has, according to an interview published in a contemporary, stated that he was not at all despondent as to the future of the Brighton Company. Just as it recovered from the temporary set-back which it experienced during the exceptionally hard winter of 1895, when there was a falling-off in the receipts during the first two months of the year, he hopes that things will right themselves in a similar way this year. The London and Brighton Company, he says, may be called the barometer of the Stock Market; whenever the latter is depressed the company is pretty sure to feel it. He anticipates that the trade prosperity now being experienced in the north will in due course find its reflection in the south. His experience is that when there is exceptional commercial activity in the north the south does not begin to feel the benefit of it until about a twelvemonth later.

The reports issued by the Scottish Railways do nothing to remove the unfavourable impression created by the dividend announcements. The North British showing is without question the worst of any Home Railway for a long time past. There was an increase in the gross receipts of £28,000, which was nearly double the estimated total. On the other hand, expenses rose by no less than £114,000. The Arbroath disaster was responsible for £32,000 of the advance, but, leaving this aside as an exceptional item, there is still left a jump of £82,000 in ordinary operating costs, of which £9,400 occurred under the heading of maintenance of way, £30,300 under locomotive power, £8,100 under carriage and wagon repairs, and £25,400 under traffic expenses. The outcome is a rise in the ratio of expenditure to receipts from 50.08 per cent. to 54.30 per cent. Meanwhile, the capital account is steadily increasing; last half-year the addition was £441,000, and it is proposed to expend another £402,000 in the current six months, of which more than half will be upon rolling-stock. My table of prices is appended:—

HOW TO OPERATE IN STOCKS SUCCESSFULLY.—See HALFORD'S ADVISER (post free).—PALMERSTON HOUSE, LONDON, E.C. ESTABLISHED 1869. TELEGRAMS: "MONITOR, LONDON."

PANDEMONIUM IN WALL STREET—TWO DAYS OF UNRESTRAINED PANIC—BIG SPECULATORS COMPELLED TO DISGORGE—THE PUBLIC NOT INVOLVED—CAUSES OF THE COLLAPSE—RELIEF ACTION BY THE UNITED STATES TREASURY—A SUBSTANTIAL RALLY FROM THE WORST.

After opening with a superficial display of strength, the American Market last week gave way to a fit of uncontrolled weakness, the like of which has not been seen for a generation. On Wednesday and Thursday the New York Stock Exchange was simply pandemonium; enormous blocks of stock were thrown overboard, utterly regardless of price, and in those two days alone the volume of shares changing hands aggregated 4,800,000. The nearest approach in recent times to last week's scenes was the excitement produced by the Northern Pacific corner in the spring of 1901, though the spasm that occurred six years ago was a small thing compared with the collapse in values that has taken place within the last few weeks. The chief consolation to be derived from the recent débacle seems to be the immunity from loss of the general public on either side of the Atlantic. It is a well-known fact that the interest of the British public in Yankees has been steadily declining for some years past, and the speculative account carried here on behalf of English people—as distinct from the large position open on behalf of Wall Street houses—has for some time been almost a negligible quantity. That the American public had also held aloof from the invitation given them to join in the gamble started last summer, despite the bait in the shape of higher dividends dangled before their eyes, is strikingly demonstrated by the fact that the huge liquidation of last week failed to disclose a single failure in Wall Street. Thus there is justification for the statement that what has happened recently is a repetition of the rich man's panic of 1903, when a few big people who had overloaded themselves with securities which they could not dispose of at the sky-scraping levels to which they had hoisted them, were compelled to finally throw their holdings overboard at knock-out prices.

What was the exact cause responsible for the panic it is difficult to say. Some people ascribed it to fears of a fresh attack against the railroads on the part of the National Government, others to the difficulty experienced by large speculators in renewing loans, while another theory was that the collapse was the outcome of a duel between rival speculative groups. It is feasible to suppose that all three factors played a part in the downfall. The public agitation against the railroads has been growing for some time, and just lately Bills for the purpose of reducing passenger rates within the borders of States have already been passed in one or both houses of a number of the State Legislatures. With net receipts already seriously affected by advances in the cost of labour and materials, and with gross takings likely to suffer through the curtailment of constructive work necessitated by the difficulty all corporations are finding in raising capital, it will be recognised that the proposed action of the States in the direction of lowering passenger rates cannot be regarded lightly. In the early part of last week the market derived a stimulus from the news that Mr. J. P. Morgan had been in conference with President Roosevelt, as a result of which arrangements had been made for a meeting between the President and heads of leading railroads for the purpose of discussing the attitude of the administration towards railroad interests. Later on, when the deluge came, Wall Street construed this interview as a "bear" point, its argument being that railroad interests had become panic-stricken by the action of the States, and were therefore anxious to surrender unconditionally to the President in order to obtain the protection of the National Government against the several States.

In view of the reports that have from time to time been circulated recently as to an alleged modification of the Presidential policy towards the Trusts, it is of interest to read a Reuter dispatch from Washington stating authoritatively that Mr. Roosevelt will not change his attitude towards the railways, though it is admitted that the administration does not intend to make an extremely radical attack on them. While nothing as yet has been definitely decided on, President Roosevelt may issue a statement outlining his attitude some time this week. The administration is firmly convinced that the great unrest in financial circles has been caused by the arguments of the railroad interests in the endeavour to prevent hostile legislation in various States, and is not due to the determination of the Government to enforce the laws relating to common carriers. It is known that President Roosevelt takes up the same position as he did in December, when he sent his message to Congress, calling attention to the fact that "during the last five months, within which the new law has been operative, the railroads have shown increased earnings, and some of them unusual dividends." The President believes that this refutes the claims made by the railroads at the time that the new law would ruin them, and emphasises the fact that rate legislation, either by the Federal or State Governments, did not cause the present panic conditions. President Roosevelt has also referred significantly to another portion of the message, in which he said: "It must not be supposed, however, that with the passage of these laws it will be possible to stop progress along the line of increasing the power of the National Government over the use of capital in inter-State commerce."

The influence that dear money has exercised in bringing about the break in values will be apparent to those who have followed the recent course of events in both the American and the European markets. For some time past certain big Wall Street speculators who persisted in indulging in their wild stock gamble, heedless of the cautions administered by those who declared that the resources of the money market were already fully taxed by the demands of legitimate trade, have found increasing difficulty in obtaining the requisite accommodation. When, a month or two ago, London bankers made an organised attempt to reduce the speculative account carried this side on behalf of New York, the result was quickly seen in a sharp tumble in values—the outcome of Wall Street's efforts to find a lodging for the stocks thrown back upon it. A few days ago it is understood that an Anglo-American house was informed that large lines of bills shortly maturing here on behalf of New York would not be renewed, and the fact that this report synchronised with the sensational decline in stock prices may explain much. The New York Money Market remains in a decidedly unsatisfactory condition, and once last week the loan rate ran up to 25 per cent. The situation became so bad as to once more call for action on the part of the United States Treasury. The measures adopted by Mr. Secretary Cortelyou included instructions to the Customs' collectors to deposit their receipts with the National Banks (which step was taken under the new Aldrich Act), the offer to redeem with interest to July 1 $25,000,000 of Government fours, and the intimation to the banks that they might retain the $18,000,000 of circulation sanctioned on October 22, with the same security, instead of retiring it immediately as was provided at the time.

Thanks to these stop-gap measures, and to the absence of failures, prices on Friday last made a distinct recovery from the worst, but they still, in several instances, show a heavy fall on the week, while the decline from the

That there should be a sharp rebound from the extreme levels touched last Thursday was inevitable, for when a stock like Union Pacific, which has just been put upon a 10 per cent. basis, was offering at under 130 it was bound to attract a certain class of speculator. At the same time the market continues in a state of extreme nervousness, for the cataclysm of the last few days is not one that can easily be forgotten. What with this upheaval and the unsavoury disclosures of the methods of Wall Street high finance that preceded it, public confidence has had a shock from which it will not quickly recover. The theory beginning to be laid down in some quarters that Yankees might be considered as investments has been rudely dispelled, and for some time to come, at least, the shares will be left alone by all except the daring professional or semi-professional speculator, who is in a position to be always in direct touch with the market, and to promptly snatch a profit or cut a loss.

CANADAS AGITATED WITH YANKEES—WHY THE SHARES SHOULD BE BOUGHT—TRUNK THIRDS AS A SPECULATIVE INVESTMENT—THE SURPRISING STRENGTH OF MEXICAN ORDINARY—ARGENTINE RAILS AND POLITICAL RUMOURS.

Once again Canadian rails, and particularly Canadian Pacifics, have been agitated in sympathy with Americans. It is, perhaps, inevitable that Canadas should move up and down with Yankees, because of Wall Street's large interest in the shares. At the same time, most of the reasons that may be advanced to justify the fall in Americans do not apply to the Colonial line. There have been no "'orrible revelashuns" connected with the management of the road, the company is not feeling the effects of Government action to reduce passenger rates, and there has been no straining after dividends with the object of facilitating capital issues. The 7 per cent. now being paid on the shares represents little more than one-third of the income that was received in the last completed year, and, therefore, there is no question about the maintenance of dividends for a long time to come. A calculation made recently demonstrated that each present Canadian-Pacific share is actually represented by cash assets and land worth about $120 per share, which would leave only some $60 per share as the market value of the railway as a going concern. I have frequently urged the claims of Canadas as a high-class investment, and the recent fall produced by purely external circumstances should present a good opportunity to the capitalist.

Grand Trunks, which are not a speculative medium with Wall-street, have not fallen far during the past week, but "bull" enthusiasm here has, for the time being, received a check. The set-back in the Third Preference might be taken advantage of by the speculative investor to "get in," seeing that there is a good prospect of the stock receiving its full 4 per cent. dividend this year. For the benefit of numerous inquirers I would repeat my opinion, which was expressed at length a month ago, that the ordinary stock ought not to be regarded as more than a gambling counter, and that there is no reasonable ground to support the view airily expressed in some quarters, that it was only a matter of a year or two before the stock entered the dividend stage. The probability is that two or three years ahead Little Trunks will be worth no more than the price at which they stand now, and this statement is made with a due regard for the very bright possibilities that lie ahead of the railroads in the Dominion.

In the Foreign Railway group Mexican Rails have shown a fair amount of fluctuation, though support has been forthcoming on each decline. The traffic record of the line lately has been excellent, but it is still hard to avoid the feeling that the rise in the ordinary stock has been too fast. It is said that the buying has been of a "good" character, and there may be something behind it which is known only to a privileged few. But, judged by the dividend outlook, so far as it can be gauged by earnings to date, I cannot advise my readers to buy the ordinary at the present level. There is, however, much to be said still for the First Preference, which is now doubtless earning at its full 8 per cent. rate with a fair margin to spare. Dear money, and uncertainty about the maize crop continue to tell against Argentine Rails. There were also rumours last week emanating from Buenos Ayres to the effect that trouble was brewing politically. Up to the time of writing these stories remain unconfirmed, and the fact that they have had scarcely any effect upon values suggests that the position has, to say the least of it, been exaggerated. Certainly, judged upon the financial strength of the leading railways, the current earnings and the yields, it cannot be said that stocks are over-priced, and a recovery ought not to be very far off. My table is appended—

KAFFIR GOLD SHARES ONE OF THE FIRMEST GROUPS IN THE HOUSE—THE LABOUR OUTLOOK—A GOLD FIELDS RUMOUR—HEAVY SELLING OF DE BEERS, BUT PREMIERS IN DEMAND.

During the recent unsettlement consequent upon the condition of semi-panic into which the American market relapsed, the Kaffir market was one of the firmest departments of the Stock Exchange. It has not wholly escaped from pressure of realisations — caused very possibly by the necessity of raising funds to meet losses incurred elsewhere—but, on the whole, it has held its own very well. This is largely due to the fact that the open position is of small volume, and that, in view of the brighter outlook for the Rand mining industry, and consequently for Kaffir gold shares, speculators who in the past frequently adopted "banging" tactics are much less disposed to do so now. This augurs well for the time when general market conditions improve. Those interested in Kaffirs should be encouraged by the way the market has maintained its position during the trying time experienced in the past week. There is little doubt that, but for the general unsettlement caused by the American slump, Kaffirs would have gone better. The speech made by General Botha at the beginning of last week, and to which I referred in my last notes, had the satisfactory result of causing a resumption of buying by Colonial and Continental speculators, and quotations quickly responded to the support thus accorded; but the upward movement was, unfortunately, nipped in the bud by the American collapse and the fear of trouble with the conclusion of the settlement. Nevertheless, on the week most of the Kaffir speculative favourites show improvement, as will be seen from the following table:—

As regards the all-important matter of labour, the question to the fore now is as to what will happen when the contracts of the coolies expire, as they will begin to do next June. Having regard to the declared intention of the new Transvaal Ministry to encourage the mining industry and to pursue a policy of repatriation with replacement, it has been assumed that the coolies will be allowed to re-engage. To permit of this, some action will have to be taken by the Legislature, and the question is raised as to whether such action will be taken in time. A cable from Johannesburg, published in one of the London morning papers the other day, says the Ministry has no intention of dealing with the Chinese question in the short session of Parliament before General Botha leaves for England, and points out that a lengthy delay of the Ministry's decision would be a serious matter for the mining industry, and increase the present depression in the Transvaal. It is to be hoped the apprehensions raised on this score will be allayed by a definite statement to-morrow on the occasion of the first meeting of the new Transvaal Legislature. All that can be said at the moment is that delay, which would entail a reduction in the coolie labour complement of the mines, would certainly not be in accordance with the terms of General Botha's speech at Pretoria on the 4th inst., when he stated that the Ministry would devote all its efforts to encouraging and helping the mines, and that in the matter of labour no extreme measures would be taken. The Letters Patent having deprived the industry and the coolies of the right to renew contracts, it remains for the new Ministry to bring in a new Ordinance to allow of the re-engagement of the Chinese, and, providing the necessary arrangements are made, the outlook for the gold mining industry will be brighter than for some years past, as it is not expected that the Home Government will exercise its power of veto, seeing that its friends are in power in the Colony. In the event of the question being satisfactorily settled, the condition of the market is likely to reflect the improvement in the outlook, and a revival of public interest in the market may be brought about, though the American situation, the imminence of the Settlement and the Easter holidays, may tend to temporarily restrict the opening of fresh speculative commitments. My readers may therefore like to have a short list of selections to consider, so I will give the names of a few shares which I think promising speculations for a profit in a good market. Of the leading counters I prefer Rand Mines; among outcrops, Glencairns, Knights, and New Kleinfonteins; and in the Deep Level list, Cinderella Deep, Robinson Deep, Simmer West, and Witwatersrand Deep.

An interesting rumour has been in circulation in respect to the Consolidated Gold Fields, it being stated that an interim dividend of half-a-crown per share is to be declared. It may be remembered that when the dividend was passed in November last the directors held out the hope of their being able to declare an interim dividend in the current year. Such a distribution, however, is dependent upon the labour question being satisfactorily settled. There is little doubt that if the Gold Fields directors do declare a dividend within a short time it will stimulate the Kaffir market, as their action will forcibly demonstrate that they consider the outlook bright.

While Kaffir gold shares have been pretty steady, the diamond group has on the whole been depressed during the past week. De Beers have been persistently sold from Paris, and have also suffered from liquidation in connection with the closing of the account of a speculator on this side, with the result that on the week the price shows a substantial decline:—

Share.	March 9, 1907.	March 16 1907.	Rise or Fall
De Beers Pref.	18 3/4	17 3/4xd.	- 1
,, ,, Def.	29 1/4	26 3/4xd.	-1 1/2

Premiers have been erratic, but in the main the "bulls" have had the best of it. I am informed that large options have been entered into in respect of these shares for the end of June, which would indicate that the price is expected to reach a higher level in the early future.

Rhodesians have also Shown Some Resistance to the General Depression—The Gold Output for February.

While there has been little in market conditions of late to cheer the hearts of those interested in Rhodesian undertakings, there is perhaps a little satisfaction to be derived from the fact that the market in the past week was able to show some resistance to the general depression. Business in these descriptions has not been very brisk, but at times the market has shown signs of shaking off the dulness which has characterised it for the most part for some weeks past, and with better general conditions on the Stock Exchange a moderate recovery in Rhodesian quotations would not be unlikely. As it is, prices in a few cases exhibit slight improvements as a net result of the past week's small volume of business, and in other cases the quotations given in the following table are above the lowest touched at one time:—

A rumour has been in circulation in the market as to a fresh issue of shares being contemplated by the Chartered Company, but dealers were not disposed to credit the story.

The shorter month largely accounts for the falling off, while it would appear that a shortage of native labour has restricted the operations of some of the mines.

General Tendency of the Westralian Market Dull—Great Fingall Dividend Reduced—The Ivanhoe Ore Reserves Estimate and the Company's General Position—A Sound Mining Holding—Comparison with Mysore.

In the Westralian market the business transacted during the past week was mainly in the nature of realisations, but as a rule where prices were marked down the decline was attributable to general market conditions rather than to any unfavourable developments in connection with the affairs of the companies concerned. One exception, however, was the Great Fingall, whose shares have been sold in consequence of the dividend just announced, the amount—half-a-crown per share—comparing with previous quarterly distributions of 3s. per share. But in view of the reduction in the output that has had to be made, the average grade having been lowered in consequence of the comparatively poor results that have attended the development of the last two levels, the further reduction in the rate of the dividend was expected in some quarters; in fact in my notes a few weeks ago I prepared my readers for this event, and, in dealing with the outlook, based my remarks to some extent on the prospects of quarterly distributions of no more than 2s. 6d. per share. Golden Horseshoes have had a sharp relapse, presumably on realisations from Paris, whence a good deal of selling has emanated during the past week in connection with more than one department of the Stock Exchange. How other shares have fared will be seen from the subjoined table:—

Ivanhoes have been one of the firmest spots in this market of late, and this is not at all surprising when one considers the position of the company. During the past week an ore reserves estimate has been issued by the Ivanhoe management, and it reveals a larger value in sight by over £200,000 than the previous computation. It is estimated that the mine has opened up 932,551 tons of ore of a total value of £2,539,838, as against 796,841 tons of a value of £2,317,829 at the end of June last. The latest figures represent fully four years' supply for the treatment plant, and a profit in sight of about £5 15s. per share. The strength of the Ivanhoe position in relation to the current market capitalisation of the mine may perhaps best be shown by contrasting it with that of another big mine. For the purpose of comparison, then, let us take the Mysore, which, judging from the considerable premium at which its shares are quoted by the market, is evidently considered to be in a strong position. Mysores are 10s. shares quoted at nearly £6, while Ivanhoes are £5 shares valued in the market at a trifle over £7. In order that my readers may be able to obtain a clear idea of the positions of the two concerns, and to tell at a glance how they compare, I have compiled the following table:—

Mine.	Ore Reserves.	Estimated Value.	Years' Supply.	Profit in Sight.	Proportion of Current Price represented by Profit in Sight.	Dividends, 1906.	Yield on Current Price.
	Tons.				Per Cent.		Per Cent.
Ivanhoe ...	932,551	£2,539,838	4	£5 15s per Share.	80	£1 4s per Share.*	16·5
Mysore ...	747,000	not stated	4	£2 16s. per Share.†	47	14s. per Share.	11·9

† Assumed on the basis of 4 years' dividends at 1906 rate.

It will be seen that while Ivanhoes yield a bigger return at the current price than Mysores, the position of a shareholder in the former is also more secure. In the case of Ivanhoes, 20 per cent. of the current price represents possibilities, whereas in the case of Mysores, the margin of risk is 53 per cent. It should also be noted that the Ivanhoe reserves represent ore developed above the 1,370 ft. level only, although all the lodes have been cut at the 1,520 ft. level and the new lode has been cut at a still greater depth. Moreover, the Ivanhoe Company has a substantial cash reserve, and this is not allowed for in the profit in sight estimate given above. At the end of 1905 the cash reserve was about £70,000, and the report for 1906, which should be issued in about a month, will doubtless show that sum to have been increased. As regards the balance dividend due to be declared by the Ivanhoe Board this month, it is most probable that the amount will be 9s. per share, making in all 24s. per share for the past year, as for 1905. All things considered, Ivanhoes appear to me to be one of the best holdings in the whole list of mining securities.

Heavy Fall in the Leading Copper Shares—The Broken Hill Group and Zincs—West African Factors—The Mysore Meeting and the Proposed Mine Redemption Fund.

The Copper group has continued one of the most active sections, and it has been one of the principal sufferers under the wide influence of the demoralised state of the American Market. Both Tintos and Anacondas have fluctuated violently from day to day, the former having been extensively realised on account of French speculators, while the latter have followed the course of Yankees. The fall in the price of copper from its high record of over £110 per ton contributed to the flatness of the leading shares, but it would appear that the drop in the metal quotation has not been due to unfavourable trade developments. At any rate, a leading firm of metal brokers has attributed the relapse to the disturbed condition of the international stock markets bringing about "bear" selling. With a removal of the disturbing element, then, the price of copper should recover, and the quotations of copper shares also; but who can say at the moment when normal conditions will again prevail? As regards Tintos, the time is drawing near for the dividend declaration and the issue of the annual report, and anticipations in respect of these will probably serve to keep speculators active, even if general market conditions assume a quiet aspect. Among other Copper favourites, Arizonas have been a comparatively firm spot, and Mount Morgans have maintained their position, thanks to Colonial buying having been forthcoming to counterbalance the selling on this side, but some of the Australian issues have been weak as a result of forced liquidation, notably Mount Lyells and Mount Elliotts. The following table shows how prices have fared on the week:—

Like most other departments, the Broken Hill section has shared in the recent depression, but there has been no particular pressure to realise shares of this class, and prices have not given way to a material extent. The general position as regards the mines themselves being satisfactory enough, it may reasonably be expected that with better general market conditions, Broken Hill quotations will recover. What would also tend to help this group as a whole would be a smart rally in Zinc Corporations, the recent heavy fall in which has checked speculation in the mine shares, although obviously the success or failure of the Zinc Corporation has no connection with the development of the mines. Zincs have been somewhat quieter since the receipt of the cable to which I referred last week, the market awaiting the promised further message from Messrs. Hoover and Loring as to the working of the plant. The price of the shares has fluctuated within narrower limits than in the preceding week, and it has been noticeable that they have been readily absorbed in the neighbourhood of 27s. A good many speculators are believed to have sold short of the shares, and it is thought the receipt of satisfactory advices from the colony would cause a scramble on the part of the "bears" to repurchase, with the result that the price would quickly spurt.

But for the general depression, it is thought West Africans would have made a rather better showing. Certainly there are one or two encouraging factors to be noted in respect of Jungle shares, improved results being reported by several of the mines. Despite the shorter month, the February returns of the Bibiani, Broomassie, and Ashanti Goldfields are all better than for January, and in connection with the shares of the last-named concern there is said to have been some buying recently by people who should be well informed as to the company's position and prospects. The reported success of the roasting plant, of course, improves the outlook for this undertaking, and hopes are being indulged in of the early declaration of a dividend. At the meeting last December the Chairman said the directors fully expected to be in a position—"and that, too, consistent with a sound financial policy"—to pay a dividend in course of the current financial year. The decision of the Abosso management to add twenty stamps to the milling equipment of the mine is also an encouraging factor, as it implies that the ore reserve position has improved, and affords promise of satisfactory dividends on the current market value of the shares. The parent company, the Taquah and Abosso, is expected to get its full mill of fifty stamps in operation in a month or two.

The event of the week in connection with the Indian group of shares was the holding of the Mysore annual meeting. The chairman held out the prospect of an increased output, but apparently it is not intended to increase the dividend in the event of larger profits being earned; the policy will be to maintain distributions at last year's rate—140 per cent.—and place the balance of earnings to a mine redemption fund. This is an interesting departure from the usual policy of those responsible for the management of the Indian gold mines. Instead of creating a reserve the general policy has been to divide profits practically up to the hilt. Consequently, in prosperous years big dividends have been paid and share values have been put up accordingly by the market. When money has been needed it has been raised by making a new issue of shares, or when developments have fallen off shareholders have had to face a reduction in their dividends, with the result that the prices of the shares have slumped. It is all very well to say, as one gentleman did at the Mysore meeting last week, that the best thing shareholders who want a reserve can do is to make one for themselves by keeping a portion of the big dividends declared. One can make the suggestion, but how many mining investors do invest part of their dividends with a view to the redemption of their capital? In the long run it would be probably better for them to agree to receive a somewhat smaller dividend so as to allow of the creation of a reserve for the equalisation of future distributions, and for providing against a run of bad luck which might call for extra expenditure on capital account. Those who bought Champion Reefs and Ooregums at high prices on the expectation of the big dividends being maintained, have had an unpleasant experience. They have seen their dividends considerably reduced, and the prices of the shares have consequently fallen. The Champion Reef quotation, which was up to 30s. at one time last year, has since been less than a third of that amount. The probability is that the dividend due to be declared by this company in a few weeks' time will show a further reduction compared with the 9d. per share declared for the corresponding period of last year. Mining enterprise is at best speculative, but if a cautious financial policy be followed the risk to be faced by a shareholder will obviously be less than if it is the practice to divide profits practically up to the hilt and put by nothing for a possible rainy day.

Prospectusless Companies.

The Bill for the amendment of the Companies Acts, which was read a second time in the House of Lords last week, is doubtless capable of improvement in some of its details, but on the whole it seems to be a praiseworthy and well-designed attempt to check the abuses that have arisen under the Act of 1900. The most salutary of all its proposals is that aimed against the promoters who evade the requirements of the Act by launching companies and "making a market" on the Stock Exchange without the issue of prospectuses. It is provided by the Bill that every company which does not on its formation issue a prospectus, shall file with the Registrar at Somerset House a statement containing all the facts which are required to be disclosed in a prospectus. This statement will, of course, be accessible to the public, so that intending investors will at any rate be in a position to obtain the information if they choose to go to the trouble of doing so. Unfortunately they are a careless race, and it is to be hoped that in committee on the Bill consideration will be given to the question whether it may not be desirable to insist upon some more public disclosure of the facts than the mere filing of a statement with the Registrar. One doubtful provision of the Bill is that empowering a Court to grant relief to directors in cases where a breach of duty has been caused by honest oversight, inadvertence, or error of judgment. On the face of it this may seem reasonable enough. But in practice—as may be seen from the revelations that are constantly being made in the Courts—far too much latitude is already given to reckless, negligent, and incompetent directors, and instead of offering them another means of escape, the law ought to bring their responsibilities home to them more closely and severely.

Share Peddling.

Though these are the days of woman's emancipation, it is news to learn that her charming sex are regarded as possible customers of touting brokers at the early age of nine. Last week a maiden of these tender years, the daughter of one of my readers, was favoured with a letter from A. Everest and Co., 82, Wells-street, Oxford-street, W., offering her for sale twenty ordinary shares in J. Lyons and Co. For some of that well-known firm's pastry the little lady might have found a use, but the shares did not appeal to her. No doubt a similar letter has been addressed to other and older persons. If, however, they desire to buy shares in Lyons and Co.—and the shares are really a good commercial investment—I should recommend them for various reasons to make the purchase through a member of the Stock Exchange. The same advice applies, of course, to the shares in other companies which A. Everest and Co. are also offering by means of circulars.

Blind Pools for Simple Fools.

Digby, Curtis and Co., 40 and 41, Sackville-street, were pilloried a few weeks ago among the bucket-shop promoters of blind pools. The circular I noticed then has since been issued afresh with the alteration of the date and a few minor changes, such as the substitution of "the handsome profit of £43 15s. on each £10 share" for the comparatively paltry £21 5s. which the previous "special syndicate stock operation" was said to have made. In the first edition of the circular the firm had decided to open another "operation" at once, in consequence of the receipt of "important information" that the shares of "a certain (American) railway" were "shortly to be taken in hand by a powerful 'bull' syndicate which is certain to advance the price of the shares at least 4 or 5 points." A month later this same statement was repeated word for word, Digby, Curtis, and Co. apparently thinking that it was not worth while to invent a new cock-and-bull story for the beguilement of the greenhorns to whom they appeal.

"Lee Baillie and Co." (until a week or two back they styled themselves "Lee Baillie and Nephew"), of 31, Basinghall-street, E.C., are another gang of the same class who evidently consider that no story is too steep for the public to swallow. "Clients joining us in this deal," they say in a recent circular, "may confidently rely on a profit something like 300 or 400 per cent." Compared with these bold practitioners, the London and British Stock and Share Corporation (manager, Walter Bell), 79, Queen-street, E.C., the London Scottish Stock Exchange, 20, Bucklersbury, E.C., and Laurie and Vincent, 70, Queen-street, E.C., exhibit a sad lack of confidence in the handling of the long bow. The London and British only profess to have made a trifling profit of £12 10s. on each £5 share in their last "special stock operation," the London Scottish are content to boast of "£13 10s. upon every £10 subscribed," while Laurie and Vincent, with still more surprising modesty, claim a mere return of 50 per cent. Whether the bait is a promise of a profit of 50 or 500 per cent., however, it seems to me that the people who fall into such booby-traps as these are not deserving of much sympathy; indeed, they need the lesson in worldly wisdom which they get.

Insurance Notes—Fair Fire Insurance—Profit-Sharing—Insurance of Policy-holder, not of Property—Inventories and Valuations.

Fires, like all other phenomena, exhibit average results when dealt with on a sufficiently large scale. For individuals the happening of a fire is quite uncertain, and the possibility of a large financial loss through fire may be avoided by a relatively small annual payment. It is an exceedingly happy arrangement that the combination of individuals in a fire company affords to each of them complete security against the risk of loss, while the whole body of the insured is equally secure against excessive risk through the operations of the laws of average. When a naturalist tells us of ingenious arrangements of mimicry, colouring, and other devices by which various animals are protected, we are filled with admiration of Nature's ingenuity; but when we see ingenuity no less great and, properly considered, no less natural, working in the social sphere, we are apt to forget to wonder and only too frequently we take to grumbling instead.

One of the complaints which is frequently made against the fire insurance companies is that their profits are too large. People point to the big dividends that are paid to the shareholders, and the high values of fire insurance shares. It is true we have not heard so much about this aspect of the matter since the fire at San Francisco, which will need profitable times for many years to come before average results are again produced. If, however, we take the accounts of insurance companies over a series of fairly normal years the profit, after paying losses, commission, and expenses, is only about 8 per cent. of the premiums paid, which cannot be considered excessive, although it is sufficient, when added to the interest on large accumulated funds, to pay very substantial dividends to shareholders.

While dealing with this aspect of the matter, however, it really does seem to me that private people and other owners of property, in connection with which the chances of fire are very small, have some cause for complaint. It is perfectly well known that the fire risks which pay best are those for which the smallest premiums are charged. Insurance at a premium of 1s. 6d. or 2s. for each £100 insured is vastly more lucrative than policies where the premium is twelve times as much. This fact is very clearly shown in the large trading profits systematically obtained by the offices which secure the largest proportion of small premium policies. Unfortunately, the most conspicuous of the companies which made a feature of this best class of business have been absorbed in recent years by companies doing foreign and hazardous insurance. The Hand-in-Hand, the Westminster, and the County have all been taken over, and now the disappearance of the Law Fire is in process of being carried through. In regard to the first three of these companies, the sales of their businesses deprived the public of insuring to such good advantage as they could formerly. The business done was select, the profits were very large, and the holders of fire insurance policies participated in the profits. This resulted in a very substantial decrease in the premiums they had to pay as compared with those charged by ordinary companies.

A fourth profit-sharing fire office is the Essex and Suffolk Equitable, which was founded in 1802. Up to quite recently this very interesting and excellent society was unable to do business within ten miles of the Royal Exchange, in consequence of certain provisions in early deeds of settlement. These provisions have been abolished, and the society has now opened an office in London. Its share capital has lately been increased, but the shareholders are not allowed to take a larger dividend than 5 per cent. per annum until the policy-holders have had half their premiums returned to them. This 5 per cent. dividend is more than provided for by the interest on the funds, so that the policy-holders have first claim upon the whole of the trading profit, which, since the business is select, are very large. I do not know how far human ingenuity can succeed in binding future generations, but so far as it is possible to do this the Essex and Suffolk has inserted conditions in its regulations purporting to make the transfer of the business to another company impossible. The methods of this society seem to me admirably devised for giving safe fire insurance on the lowest terms to the best class of policy-holders, who, in normal cases, undoubtedly pay a vast deal more for their insurance protection than it really costs.

Having thus pointed out one particular instance in which the majority of the fire offices make excessive profits out of their best customers, it is appropriate to deal with another aspect of the question, in regard to which the companies are right, and a great many policy-holders are wrong. It is extremely common for people to say that if they are insured for £1,000 and the whole of the insured property is destroyed by fire, the company ought to pay £1,000 regardless of the value of the property at the time it was burnt, and without requiring any proof that property to the value of £1,000 was destroyed. Now I have no hesitation in saying that such a practice as this, or any approximation to it, is both undesirable and impracticable, and there are various cogent reasons for this opinion. In the first place, we must remember that the business of the companies is insurance against loss by fire; they do not profess to cover losses arising from other causes. If as a trader my goods depreciate in market value, the companies contract to pay me the value of the goods at the time they were destroyed, not to give me the price I paid for them. If a picture would now fetch only one-tenth of what I gave for it, the company will not compensate me for my lack of judgment; if my sheets and blankets are nearly worn out through long use, my policy does not pretend to replace them with new ones of the same quality as the old. All that the contract does cover, and all that it ought to cover, is my loss by fire. It is a fundamental and necessary condition of fire insurance that the company insures me personally against loss by fire up to the amount of my policy. A fire policy for £1,000 is not at all the same sort of thing as a life policy for £1,000. When a life policy becomes a claim its face value has to be paid without any questions arising as to whether the financial loss to my dependants at my death is greater or less than my financial value at the time I assured.

In fire insurance, however, it is not, and cannot be so. It is altogether against the general good that people should be able to make profits out of a fire. A fire policy that put a premium on incendiarism, either by replacing old goods by new ones, by realising the cost price of goods which have decreased in market value, or in any other ways, would, if it were introduced, not merely increase enormously the cost of fire insurance for honest people, but would probably have to be prohibited by law.

This brings me to another question about which I am continually receiving inquiries—that of having valuations of one's property made from time to time with the idea that the fire companies will settle claims on the basis of such valuations. With one or two exceptions, none of the fire offices will accept such a valuation as proof of loss, and it seems to me that they would be quite wrong if they did. An inventory and a valuation made in 1907 affords no proof of either the existence or the value of goods destroyed in 1910; and considering the way in which countless frauds on insurance companies are attempted I think they might just as well close their doors altogether as attempt to settle claims without proof of loss.

I am all in favour of the most explicit conditions in policies, and of their being fair both to the insured and to the companies, but in regard to fire insurance it is a positive necessity that the companies should give no loophole by means of which unscrupulous persons could make a profit out of a fire. In the vast majority of cases honest claims, whether small or large, are fairly met and promptly paid. To introduce conditions which might seem more fair, and which would not be abused by honest people would inevitably increase the opportunities for fraud, and thereby make fire insurance much more expensive all round than it is at present. Some of the normal conditions may not be ideal, but for practical purposes they work well and are satisfactory.

Notes on New Issues.

Prospectuses have been issued by the following:—

The Maudslay Motor Company (1907), Limited.—Capital £100,000, divided into 80,000 Seven and a Half per Cent. Cumulative Preferred Ordinary and 20,000 Deferred Ordinary shares. The former are offered for subscription. The company acquires the business of the Maudslay Motor Company, Coventry and London.

The deferred shares are allotted as fully paid to the shareholders of the vendor company in part payment of the purchase price. After payment of the fixed dividend on the preferred ordinary shares, the deferred will be entitled to a 7½ per cent. dividend and the balance of profits will be equally divided between the two classes. By the articles of association each deferred share carries four votes. In view of these arrangements in favour of the deferred shareholders, together with the absence from the prospectus of any statement as to the profits of the business acquired, the offer of the preferred ordinary shares is not at all attractive.

Chicago Great Western Railway Company.—Offers for subscription $3,873,000 Four per Cent. Debenture stock.

This is not exactly a happy moment for an American railway issue, but there seems to be fair security for this stock.

Thomas Wolfe and Son (1907), Limited.—Capital £150,000, in £1 shares, of which 80,000 are now issued, 53,500 being offered for subscription. The new company acquires the business of Thomas Wolfe and Sons, Limited, jobmasters, of Woburn-square, W.C., which is to be extended by the purchase for hiring of town motor carriages and touring cars.

The profits of the vendor company are not set out, though a statement is made as to the average dividend that has been paid on the ordinary shares. "It is expected, on a conservative estimate," says the prospectus, "that the capital invested in motor vehicles will earn ten per cent. as net profit." Obviously the shares offered on the strength of this expectation must be speculative.

Stanley Brothers, Limited.—This company, formed in 1905, carries on brick and tile works and collieries at Nuneaton and elsewhere. An issue is now made of £75,000 Five per Cent. Debenture stock.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities.

A. B. C., Boscombe.—Hold both as investments. C. W. D.—A very fair investment of the second class.

Railways.

M. F., Cardiff.—No; you had better have nothing to do with such a system of speculation. Kent.—The market in both has been disappointing, but the long spell of dear money has operated against all securities, and has played havoc with many reasonable anticipations. You ought, in my opinion, to hold Midland Deferred; the instrinsic merits on which my opinion was based still hold good. Anxious.—You could get safety and a yield of 3½ per cent. by buying, say, London and South-Western Railway 4 per cent. Preference. Wolverley.—Both Little Chat-hams and Caledonian Deferred are very poor holdings. I should be inclined to sell. Stannerton.—1. Metropolitan District Three per Cent. Rent Charge should be held. 2. Also Midland Deferred. Canada.—1. Under the circumstances, yes. 2 and 3. Having bought "cum. div." and sold "ex. div." you should be credited with the dividend, and thus your loss would be 7½. If you had no confidence in your man, why did you deal with him? Cantab.—The stock is worth holding as a speculative investment, but I see no attraction in running it upon borrowed money. K. L. T.—Ultimately there may be a recovery, but the immediate outlook is anything but bright. It is possible that you might do better to exchange into, say, Great Northern Deferred or Hulls. See this week's comments. I will keep your suggestion in mind, but objections to carrying it out often come from correspondents themselves. Borril.—I am afraid there is little chance of an early recovery, and think you might exchange into Hull and Barnsley Ordinary.

Mines.

C. L. D.—Please note Rule 1. An exchange into Chillagoes would be likely to turn out well in time. Cæsarea.—No special reason has transpired for the decline, and I think you might hold for a recovery. A further purchase to average would be a fair speculation, but you should not put too much money into one concern. Preston.—1. There has recently been some talk of a reconstruction, but I have no official information. 2. I would not subscribe any money for such a purpose. G. M.—I see no reason to anticipate much improvement in No. 1 in the early future, but the South Africans are a fair holding with a view to a rise in a buoyant market.

Mixed Securities.

Flip.—1. I should not buy them. 2 and 3. I do not see much attraction in these at present. 4. A hopeful holding. 5. Very promising; see my remarks in this week's article. 6. Keep them, if you have any. D. K.—What information do you require? Adew.—1. Hold them. 2. The lines are doing very well, and the shares are worth keeping. 3. The bonds appear to be fairly well secured, and at the price they are not without attraction. 4. A very speculative holding. Better sell. 5. Very speculative, but may have some improvement if copper keeps up. 6. The stock should get not less than 3 per cent., and will probably get its full 4 per cent. Sabrina.—1. El Oros recently had a very fair advance, but have since relapsed slightly. On any further decline the shares would be worth picking up with a view to dividends. 2. Simply the dividend, I think. 3. No special reason that I am aware of. Sheila.—1 and 2. Hold for a better market. 3. The Company is doing very well, and a rise is quite likely. Foreigner.—1. The stock will probably recover in sympathy with the senior issues. It is, however, nothing better than a gambling counter, and if your idea is investment, better exchange into the Third Preference. 2. Since you wrote the price has fallen, and I think you should hold for a recovery. I. M. S.—I must ask you to comply with Rule 1 in future. 1. A mere gambling counter. 2. A very speculative holding, and you might as well exchange into something which is more active. Curley.—1. Quite good, though it would be better to choose a non-terminable security. You could get 3½ per cent. with safety upon some of our best English Railway Preferences. 2. Represents the splitting of original Ordinary stock into two equal parts, called Preferred and Deferred. On the former the dividend is fixed, while the latter ranks next for dividend, the amount upon which is not limited. 3. By no means. The yield is a beggarly 2¼ per cent. Waterloo.—After the recent heavy fall a rally, if only temporary, would not be surprising, and you might therefore continue for the present. Inexperienced, Valve, Preston, and others.—You could get from 4½ to 5 per cent. with very fair security by buying Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. Bonds (first series), United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage Bonds, Buenos Ayres Western Railway Four and a Half per Cent. new Preference, Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, Mexican Railway First Preference, Bradford Dyers Preference, Pears Preference, and Raphael Tuck and Sons Preference. Spread the money to limit the risk, the number of securities chosen of course depending upon the amount you have to invest. Huntsman.—1. Better hold for the present. 2. The stock looks high enough, but in view of the strong support understood to be accorded, a better opportunity might be afforded of getting out. 3. As a speculation, the shares should be kept for the present; there is talk of a higher dividend. 4. I have no recent information. 5. Buenos Ayres Western Four and a Half per Cent. new Preference, and Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference. Jacobus.—1. See list of 4½-5 per cent. stocks given to other correspondents. 2. See Rule 8. Invalidi.—1. Prospects are not very promising at present, but you may as well hold in hope of something turning up. 2. I regard b as a promising purchase, but it does not yield anything like 5 per cent. The return is not quite 4 per cent. at the current quotation. Better leave c alone; (a) might be bought. Hindu.—1. Grand Trunk Pacific Railway new Four per Cent. Debentures ought to suit you. 2 and 3. No doubt you have seen the article on the so-called "bank" in Truth of February 27. P. A. M.—1. Leopoldinas would be a fair speculative purchase for a rise between now and the dividend. 2. Hold the Cuban Rails, though I cannot venture to predict such a rise as you suggest. 2. The prospects of the Mexican Railway are bright; at the same time it is difficult to justify the recent big rise in the Ordinary, and the statement that the buying has been "good" only makes the movement the more puzzling. At present levels better stick to the Home Railway stock. Bingo.—The present return on the "B" annuities is of course less than that on the "A," 5s. 2d. per pound of annuity being deducted from the former to form a sinking fund, which it is calculated will produce as nearly as possible £174 5s. 11d. per £100 of old stock at the expiry of the annuity in 1948 (this works out at £26 2s. per £1 of annuity). It would be a pity to part with such a first rate security, though it would probably suit you better to exchange from "A." to "B." 2. I believe they have. R. B.—Never heard of the shares. 2. Would be unattractive even at half the figure mentioned. Badger.—1. A fairly promising speculative purchase at the moment. 2. Coal factors. A decent holding, but devoid of speculative qualities. 3 and 4. Both fair of their type. H. A. T.—(a) Humbers might be bought upon any temporary market decline. (b) Last year the dividend was reduced, but they are nevertheless a fair holding. (c) Merely passable. (d) In view of the declining dividends they are not very promising. (e) Van Den Bergh Ordinary are worth keeping. F. G. E.—To realise and put the proceeds into something more hopeful would be wise. T. F. C.—1. Hold. 2. If you want something with speculative qualities, Darracqs, Humbers, and Argyll Motors might suit. Bucks.—Both might be held for the time being. Jacandem.—They are not very brilliant, but might be held. Thrift.—Save for Dunlops they make a decent selection. Boissiere.—I do not regard them as attractive. Senex.—I think 1 and 2 ought to be held. No. 3 and 4 ought to go higher within the next few months. 5. It will be some time before the factor alluded to menaces the stock. 6. The threatened legislation makes the outlook uncertain. P. N. M.—1. You cannot get a "minimum return of 5 per cent. on safe stocks." I would suggest your studying the 4½-5 per cent. securities recommended in this column to others. 2. Too speculative. Cariad.—1 and 2. The market is best left alone. 3. See Rule 8. Lee.—1. Hold. 2 and 3. No. York.—Hold all of them.

Insurance.

H. R.—A brief reference was made to the matter in my insurance notes some weeks ago, and I intend to deal with it in more detail at an early date. Onus.—The Yorkshire Insurance Company is sound and good in every way. E. S. C.—I have little belief in the company you are assured in; if you have recently joined, drop the policy. The Century and Scottish Temperance are better than the other office you name. See my insurance article of March 6. A. B. C.—I cannot recommend either of the companies you mention. See my reply to "E. S. C." above. Stability.—The company is quite sound. I dealt with it at very considerable length in Truth for August 22, September 12, and September 26, 1905. Lieut. D. S.—The Corporation is quite sound, and its policies for the purpose you want are good. C. E. G.—You were wise not to be victimised. Quite likely I will give before long the free advertisement you suggest. J. O. B.—I have but a poor opinion of this company, whose circular is in bad taste and needs considerable qualification. People who want the kind of policy referred to in it can do better elsewhere. Southampton West.—A good deal depends upon age. Tell me the dates of birth and I will advise as to the best company to go to. J. P.—I have a very poor opinion of all the three house-purchase companies which you mention, and should advise you to go elsewhere. See reply to "E. S. C." The North British and Mercantile is sound beyond any possibility of question. S. G. P.—See reply to "E. S. C."

Miscellaneous.

Duped.—It is a point on which I do not care to take the responsibility of advising you. The shares are a hopeful holding. I do not know the paper, but from what you say as to its advice it is evidently one to be avoided. C. W. M.—The system mentioned is a gamble—not an investment—which I do not recommend. Oxford.—Not at all a promising purchase. Caution.—Read my rule as to coupon. H. M.—I hardly think anyone will be misled. The Company, by the way, has been established over thirty years. Bond, X. Y. Z., Stan., and C. H. K. J.—I do not recommend a purchase of such bonds; in any case avoid the International Securities Syndicate, Cunliffe, Russell and Co., and similar touting firms, which charge most exorbitant prices. Widow.—I have published frequent warnings against "Martin Bull" and "John B. McKenzie." Uncertain.—1. Apparently due to the approaching completion of some big contracts. May recover if other contracts are obtained. 2. A further purchase of Baskets would be likely to prove remunerative in time. 3. See Rule 8 above. A. M. W.—There is a firm of the name you mention at Pinners' Hall, Old Broad-street, but I have had to warn my readers against them. P. W. C.—Thanks for the circulars. Ladies' Agency.—Bradford Dyers. Hilda.—I do not recommend it. Read my weekly articles for such information.

Hudson's Bays Still Falling—Vickers, Sons, and Maxim—Depreciation of Productive Plant—Daimlers and Dunlops—Ocean Accident.

In the midst of more or less general demoralisation the Miscellaneous market as a whole exhibited a welcome degree of steadiness, the most conspicuous exception to the rule being Hudson's Bays. Like other Canadians, they suffered from the American slump, and in one day a drop of as much as 8 points was recorded, but a rally occurred before the end of the week, and the closing quotation was 106. This, however, still leaves a total loss of 11 points on the past fortnight. Nor will a further decline in the near future be at all surprising, for there are signs and portents that the Canadian land boom cannot last unchecked much longer. Anglo-American Telegraph deferred have been fairly firm, and scarcely any changes have been marked in other securities of the same class. A noteworthy feature of the week has been the strength of steel and engineering companies' shares. It is well known that these industries are now in a highly prosperous state, and the report of Vickers, Sons, and Maxim affords further striking evidence of that fact. For 1906 the net profit of this great undertaking was £879,905, being an advance of £92,127 on 1905, which in its turn had displayed a gain of £100,000 on the preceding year. There is, however, no increase in the ordinary dividend of 15 per cent. which was paid a year ago, the directors prudently preferring to apply the sum of £250,000 to writing down the item of goodwill and patents. That item is thereby reduced to £250,000, so that in another year or so it ought to be entirely wiped out. The prospects of the company for the current year are very good, and at the existing prices both the ordinary and the preference shares—the former giving a yield of about 6 per cent. and the latter 4 3-16—are worthy of attention. All the talk about international disarmament will end in smoke—let us hope that it will not be the smoke of battle—and Vickers, Sons, and Maxim (who have now, by the way, acquired a quarter interest in the firm of Whitehead and Co., the torpedo manufacturers) will no doubt long do a lucrative business in the production of armour plates and guns and warships. In connection with engineering companies, the paper on the depreciation of productive plant which Mr. P. D. Leake read last week before the Institute of Directors, is specially interesting, though what he said is, of course, also applicable to many other undertakings. For the protection and guidance of investors, he advocated the introduction of a system of statutory registers in which records would have to be made of the date of purchase, original cost, and estimated efficient economic life of every class of productive plant, as well as of the provision (if any) that was being made for depreciation. Whatever may be thought of this proposal, there can be no question as to the necessity for the general adoption of more scientific and regular methods of providing for depreciation.

In the motor section the scheme of the Daimler directors for the reorganisation of the capital of the company has been the chief source of interest. It is proposed to call up the unpaid balance of ten shillings each on the existing preference shares, to extinguish their preferential rights in return for a cash bonus of six per cent. on their nominal amount, making them rank hereafter with the existing ordinary shares, and to create a new preference capital of £300,000, of which £100,000 will be issued forthwith. The present preference shares are now entitled to a six per cent. cumulative dividend and one-half of the surplus profits after six per cent. has been distributed on the ordinary shares, with priority as to capital. It is scarcely astonishing that the proposal to cancel these rights for a bonus, amounting only to one year's dividend, has not been favourably received by the holders of preference shares; and although it is encouraging to know that the company's business continues to expand, it would certainly appear that a more equitable method of raising the additional funds that are needed for working purposes could have been devised. The present scheme has brought about a slight decline both in the preference and the ordinary shares. The report of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company was deemed somewhat disappointing, though its position has now been improved by a drastic reduction of the inflated capital account from £3,994,800 to £2,119,900. On the deferred shares the dividend is 5 per cent. and on the ordinary 8 per cent. An offer of 38,100 shares in the Dunlop Rubber Co., the most profitable of the subsidiary undertakings, is now made to the shareholders in the parent company at a premium of £5 per share. There has been some demand for Darracqs as the result of the reported arrangement for the introduction of the shares on the Paris Bourse, but, for the rest, motors have been featureless. Breweries remain depressed, and in catering companies' shares there have been no movements of any significance.

Among insurance shares the issues of the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation advanced on the appearance of a very satisfactory report. A further dividend of 7½ per cent. together with a bonus of 10 per cent. is recommended, this making, with the interim dividend, 25 per cent. for 1906, as compared with 20 per cent. in 1905. The revenue for the year amounted to £1,178,385, as compared with £1,113,676 in 1905, and the claims paid and provided for amounted to £578,000 as compared with £605,826. The general insurance fund, together with the reserve, amounts to £1,391,537. The revenue account shows, after debiting all charges and expenses, a credit balance of £554,814, leaving, after making provision for unexpired risks, £172,814. Investments and other assets amount to £1,623,439.

QUEER STORY.

AN UNLUCKY LINCOLN.

"I SAY, Berty, dear boy; I wonder if you'd execute a little commission for me."

"What's that, old girl?"

"Get me a monkey on Skyscraper for the Lincolnshire. I wouldn't ask you, only, you know, the bookies won't have any dealings with us women direct. I'm sure I can't think why," she added, with an artless, petulant little pout.

Berty Combermere knew why. He had good reason to know. This was not the first time that Angela Fisherton had employed him as agent in her betting transactions; and on each occasion when she had lost, she had left him to settle up off his own bat, serenely unconscious, apparently, of her own obligations in the matter.

The proceeding was essentially feminine, though why women should be less punctilious than men over their debts of honour I confess I do not understand. Indeed, in order to do so one must first arrive at the inner workings of the woman's mind—a thing that no mere man has ever yet achieved. The fact is the two things—the male mind and the female mind—are like Euclid's definition of parallel straight lines, "which, being produced ever so far both ways, never meet." The wise man, therefore, is he who, without wasting his time on trying to comprehend what is beyond him or to study the motive springs of woman's conduct, is content to take that conduct as he finds it, and to shape his attitude towards her accordingly.

To this extent the bookmaker is a wise man, inasmuch as, without troubling himself about the why or the wherefore of woman's deficient moral sense in matters pecuniary, he philosophically accepts the fact, and declines to do business with her. Berty Combermere, though not himself a monument of wisdom, would have liked to adopt the same line, and excuse himself from undertaking the fair Angela's commission. But, in the circumstances, that was next door to impossible. When an exceedingly good-looking girl—one, moreover, with whom you are very much épris—asks you, to your face, to do a little favour of this kind for her—well, you can hardly say you won't, can you? Berty, at any rate, was unequal to the requisite display of moral courage, and he answered:

"All right, old girl; I'll see if I can get it on for you."

"Thanks awfully," she rejoined. "I've every confidence of pulling it off this journey. From what I'm told, Skyscraper is the pick of the basket."

"Umph! Price rather too short, though," interposed Berty, shaking his head. "I see he's quoted in this morning's paper at fives; and, to my mind, fives isn't good enough in any handicap—especially at the very beginning of the season, when the whole form of the entry is enveloped in Egyptian darkness."

"There's something in that, I dare say, Berty. And if you can get me a longer price, by all means, do."

"No chance of it, I'm afraid. I shan't get more than market price. Old Gildersleeves isn't a philanthropist; nor any other member of the Ring either, for that matter."

"Grasping old wretch! They say he's worth half a million."

"I rather doubt that," replied Berty. "These big bookies are seldom so rich as people give 'em credit for. Not but what Tim Gildersleeves must have done himself pretty well out of backers, all the same."

'He's done himself pretty well out of me, at any rate," sighed Angela, plaintively. "I'm sure I should be afraid to say how much money I have lost to him since this time last year."

Berty Combermere could hardly help smiling—though, for him, it was scarcely a smiling matter—at his fair companion's way of putting it. It was true, indeed, that Angela had lost money rather heavily during the period mentioned; but it was equally true that he (Berty) had had to pay up in every instance, so that he, not she, was the actual sufferer. However, the matter did not seem to strike Angela in that light at all, as little pecuniary matters of this sort never did. To her it was as much a matter of course that her men friends, who made her bets for her, should pay the piper in event of loss, as that, when they took her to a theatre or a restaurant, they should stand her her stall or her dinner. What else were men friends for?

From this you may see that to be one of Angela's men friends was a somewhat expensive privilege; and yet she did not lack men friends, in spite of it. Not only, as I have said, was Angela exceedingly pretty; she was also very much the rage. When she had made her début in society last season, under the wing of her aunt, Lady Wilie, with whom she had then recently come to reside, she caught on from the first in the most remarkable manner. Her youth, her beauty, her freshness, her vivacity, her daring conversation, her reckless disregard of conventionality—this irresistible combination of attractions took the men by storm. Even among the sirens of musical comedy she had scarcely a rival. The gilded youth ran after her. Everybody talked about her, and the women hated her—which was the most certain sign of all that she had scored a hit.

The mothers of sons and the sisters of brothers used all their influence to keep their men-folk from the spell of Angela Fisherton's beaux yeux. To that end they ransacked the scandal market for facts to the girl's discredit, and where facts failed them did not hesitate to invent suitable fictions.

They began by insinuating doubts as to the respectability of her parentage. Who was she? Where had she sprung from? Whence had her aunt so suddenly unearthed her? Assuming her to be her ladyship's niece—as was given out—it must follow that, since Lady Wilie's maiden name was certainly not Fisherton, the girl must be the daughter of one of her sisters. Inquiry so far confirmed this as to show that Lady Wilie's youngest sister had married a ne'er-do-well named Fisherton, who had long ago gone to the devil, having first broken his wife's heart and driven her into an early grave.

But these inquisitive scandal-mongers could hear nothing of any offspring of the ill-fated marriage. Indeed, it seemed to be pretty certain that the union had been childless. How, then, was this Angela to be accounted for? There had been odd stories afloat about Lady Wilie before her marriage with the now deceased Sir Gerard Wilie, twenty years previously, and Angela's age was just twenty-one. Take this fact, couple it with her ladyship's warm interest in the girl, and the inference was obvious. Nor were there wanting inventive minds to corroborate this scandalous suggestion with precise circumstantial details, such as the name of the convent school at which Angela had been brought up, and the exact annual charges paid by her "aunt" for the girl's education in that establishment.

Having thus discredited her origin, they proceeded to do all in their power to discredit her character. But here they rather over-reached themselves by making their animus against the girl too obvious. If a woman wants to set her son, or her brother, against an undesirable girl who is dangerously attractive to him, she can adopt no course more sure to defeat itself than to be constantly speaking against the girl in his presence. For even in this twentieth century man has still enough chivalry left to dispose him to take the side of a pretty girl whose character is being spitefully assailed by her fellow-women; and, apart from this, he is naturally a pig-headed and contrary animal, whom any open attempt to influence in one direction is pretty certain to drive in exactly the other.

Now, in the abstract, one cannot altogether blame the women for thus trying to put a spoke in Angela's wheel, for though her character, in the restricted sense of the word, was not open to imputation, there is no doubt that she was a heartless, unscrupulous, and dangerous young person. The wholesale way in which she encouraged the men to run after her and drew them on to make love to her, yet all the while cared nothing for any of them except for what she could get out of them, was a proceeding that admitted of no justification; and up to this point, at any rate, the charges against her rested on a solid basis. Her rivals, however, who were her bitterest accusers, were scarcely the people to bring these charges forward, since there was scarcely one of them who, given the same attractions and opportunities, would not have behaved in precisely the same way. But to return to my story.

Of Angela's many admirers, Berty Combermere was perhaps the one whom she affected most. He was by no means the richest of them, although, for a bachelor, he enjoyed a comfortable, not to say a substantial, income. But he was the most generous and the most easy-going—one of those men who find a constitutional difficulty in saying "No"; and the less a man was capable of saying "No," the more the insatiable Angela liked him. You see, she was poor. She made no secret of it. Yet the amount of money she got through in the year must have run into thousands, for, apart from her dressmaker's and milliner's bills, she was a persistent gambler both on the Turf and at the card-table, and though she sometimes brought off a good coup by her reckless punting, she very much more often lost heavily. Backing horses is a fool's trick at any time, even if it be indulged in with judgment and moderation; but Angela had neither judgment nor moderation; she just plunged at random as the fancy seized her, and, naturally enough under such circumstances, she was perpetually finding "wrong 'uns." This, you might have thought, would have taught her sense and led her to profit by experience. Angela, however, was not the girl to profit by experience. She was far too much the born gambler. "If you go on long enough, the luck must turn." That was her light-hearted maxim; and as this process of "going on long enough" cost her nothing, all the expense being borne by one or other of her men friends, the fair Angela was able to pursue it with little personal inconvenience.

But this sort of thing can't last for ever. The patience even of a Berty Combermere is not inexhaustible, and a period had now arrived when he was beginning to grow rather sick of Angela's treatment of him. She accepted his amatory advances up to a certain point complacently enough, but whenever he tried to press for a definite engagement, she always put him off with evasive replies, until it became clear, even to his enamoured understanding, that she was simply playing with him.

It was with this conviction strong upon him, and consequently in no very good humour, that he went round to Tattersall's to see Tim Gildersleeves and book the bet of that monkey about Skyscraper.

"As I've undertaken the thing, I'll do it this journey," he muttered to himself; "but it's positively the last time I'll let her make a catspaw of me. I don't believe she cares for me a button, except in so far as I serve her convenience. She hasn't a grain of heart in her whole composition."

In this frame of mind, he found and accosted Tim Gildersleeves, the well-known bookmaker, with whom he always did business.

"Morning, Tim."

"Morning, Mr. Combermere," replied Gildersleeves, a well-dressed, portly, and genial personage whose appearance denoted the urbane good temper engendered by solid prosperity. "And how's the world using you, sir? You don't look so very chirpy to-day."

"Don't feel it, either," rejoined Berty, with unwonted moroseness. "Look here, Tim. I want to put a monkey on Skyscraper for the Lincolnshire Handicap."

Tim Gildersleeves pulled out his betting-book, and, pencil in hand, regarded it thoughtfully:

"Well, I'm pretty full up on Skyscraper," he answered, after a pause. "Still, for so good a client as yourself, Mr. Combermere——"

"It's not for myself," interposed Berty, whose sense of grievance made him unusually communicative. "I wouldn't touch the beast at the price. I'm getting the money on for a lady."

"Ah! for a lady?" said Gildersleeves, regarding the young man with an amused twinkle in his genial eye. "You'll excuse my saying so, Mr. Combermere, but I'm old enough to be your father; that's not a very paying game, that ain't."

"I know it, Tim—to my cost," answered Berty, with some bitterness.

"Then pardon me, sir, but why do you play it?" inquired Gildersleeves, with almost a paternal air.

"Don't know. Because I'm a damned fool, I suppose," replied Berty.

Tim nodded.

"Well, I expect we've all of us made fools of ourselves over a woman one time or another," he remarked. "But to make a lady's bets for her—it's such a very 'heads I win, tails you lose' arrangement, that is. If I were you, Mr. Combermere, I'd drop it; I would, really," he added in tones of kindly concern.

"I mean to, Tim, after to-day. I've been made a convenience of long enough."

Again Tim Gildersleeves nodded, regarding Berty Combermere thoughtfully.

"Look here, Mr. Combermere," he said, after a minute's silence, "I'm not so keen on booking this bet, myself; and you, I take it, are not so very keen on risking your monkey, either. Well, then, what do you say to simply dropping it all—eh, sir?"

"I'd much rather, Tim; but I've promised the lady. I must do it for her this time."

"She need never know," answered Tim Gildersleeves, with a meaning wink.

"Not if the colt loses," replied Berty; "but what if, by an off-chance, he happens to win—eh?"

The bookie smiled.

"Hark'ee, Mr. Combermere," he said, "you've been a good client to me, and I'm going to show my appreciation of it now by telling you—in confidence and against my own interests—a bit of information I wouldn't breathe to any other man alive. It wasn't because I'm full up that I had any hesitation about booking your bet. It was simply and solely because I didn't want to see you let in for that monkey, after all your heavy losses of last season. And that brings me to the bit of information of which I spoke. Skyscraper won't win, sir. He's not out to win. I can't divulge the source of my information; I can only assure you that it's absolutely reliable. There, Mr. Combermere, now you know the exact position."

"Hang it all, Tim," ejaculated the impulsive Berty, genuinely touched by the bookmaker's frank and handsome behaviour, "now I do call that damned generous of you——"

"Not at all, Mr. Combermere; not at all, sir," replied Gildersleeves, modestly, cutting him short. "You've been a good client to me, and I'm pleased to have this opportunity of acknowledging it. Why should you drop five hundred over a beast that's dead cert. to lose, when there's no necessity? Let the lady think you've put the money on for her. The colt will lose, you'll have nothing to pay, and she'll be none the wiser. Now, don't you agree with me that that's sound business?"

"Sound enough from my point of view, Tim. But, all the same, I hardly like taking advantage——"

"Tut-tut. We won't look at it in that way, Mr. Combermere. A good turn to a good client. And why not? I'm sure I can well afford it, after all the money I took off you last season," said Gildersleeves, with a genial smile.

But at that moment, another client of the bookmaker's coming up, the conversation was necessarily brought to a rather sudden termination.

Berty Combermere went away entertaining a much higher opinion of the bookmaker than he had ever had before. That Gildersleeves was a straight man in business he had always known. But that he was capable of behaving with the uncalled-for generosity he had just shown was a revelation to our young friend, whose heart quite warmed towards the elder man, as the hearts of young fellows do, when their better impulses are thus appealed to. Then he began to think of what he should say to Angela, who had arranged to dine with him at the Carlton that evening. To tell her the truth was, of course, impossible, as it would involve the betrayal of Tim Gildersleeves' confidence. Well, he must tell her a white lie, that was all; must give her to understand that he had duly executed her commission. There could be no harm in that. Angela's interests were not really affected one way or the other. The only thing was that he himself was relieved of the unnecessary burden of having to pay up £500.

Still, his heart smote him a little when the time came, for Angela was unusually sweet to him that evening, causing his resentment against her almost entirely to evaporate.

It did, somehow, seem rather mean to tell even a white lie to a girl at the very moment when her manner towards him was more tender and responsive than it had ever been before. Yet there was no help for it, so it had to be; and when, in the course of conversation she happened to ask: "You got that monkey on for me all right, old boy?" he nodded assent, and there should have been an end of it. But, unfortunately, it wasn't. The telling of even white lies sometimes involves subsequent awkward complications, and so, by a most unlucky chance, it fell out now.

Angela went down to Lincoln with a party of friends, of whom Berty Combermere made one. They put up at the best hotel in the old cathedral town, and all enjoyed themselves thoroughly, Berty included, until the morning of Tuesday, when the young man experienced rather a nasty shock.

This was administered by Tim Gildersleeves, who met him in the paddock shortly before the big event, and, requesting a few words with him, drew him aside. Gildersleeves looked very much concerned and upset, which—considering what he had to tell Berty—was hardly surprising.

"Mr. Combermere," he said, in an agitated voice, "I've only found out ten minutes ago that I've been sold, sir—infernally and damnably sold."

"How so, Tim? What do you mean?" inquired Berty Combermere.

"Why, the information I had about Skyscraper was all a plant—an intentional plant of his owner's, I've too much reason to suspect—in order to lengthen the odds against his colt. Skyscraper is out to win, Mr. Combermere; and, what's more, the stable's confident he has the race comfortably in hand. I do hope they're mistaken, by G—d, for if the brute gets home I'll be pretty well broke."

"Great heavens!" ejaculated Berty Combermere, turning pale. "And I told Miss Fisherton I had got on that monkey for her."

"I'm truly sorry to have been the innocent cause of misleading you, I am indeed," rejoined the unfortunate Gildersleeves, earnestly. "I wouldn't have had it happen for anything. It's a bad job for us both; but worse for me, as I'm in up to the neck. However, the race is not won yet; that's one comfort. And the stable may be wrong, after all. I hope to G—d they are," he added, with pardonably vehement profanity.

"By the Lord, Tim, so do I," cried the dismayed Combermere.

Though he was not involved so deeply as Gildersleeves, he was still involved quite deeply enough. If Skyscraper pulled it off, Angela would suppose she had won £2,500, and would naturally look to receive her winnings next settling-day. What's more, he should have no option, as a man of honour, but to pay them over to her. £2,500 would not absolutely break him, indeed. But it would cripple him pretty seriously; and altogether it was the devil of a situation in which he had landed himself. There still remained, however, as Tim had said, one hope—the hope that Skyscraper might not, after all, justify the stable's confidence.

But that last forlorn hope did not, as the spiritualists would say, materialise. Skyscraper got home by three lengths; and the following Monday Berty Combermere, adopting the only course open to him as a gentleman, handed Angela Fisherton his cheque for £2,500.

It made him pretty sick. He would have been even more sick had he been able to hear the following conversation that took place between Angela and Tim Gildersleeves on the evening of the same day:

"Managed that rather well, I think, daddy," laughed Miss Angela.

"Rippin'," sniggered the parental Gildersleeves. "You see, my dear, if I'd booked the bet in the ordinary way, I should simply have had to find the £2,500 myself to pay our own winnings with. Whereas by getting out of booking it——"

"The worthy Berty had to find the oof instead. Just so," cut in Miss Angela. "But, I say, Dad, I guess this is about the last time he will let me squeeze him. What do you think?"

"I think it highly probable. But happily he is not the only mug in the world, my dear," replied her parent, with a placid smile.

ART NOTES.

THE ARTISTIC TEMPERAMENT.

IT is always pleasant to have some proof that people are reading what you write—even if it leads them to set little traps for you. A short time back I made some remarks about the lack of business acumen in the average artist, and ever since I have been receiving all manner of proof that I was wrong. Now the movement has spread to the authors, and one of them, a lady, has set a neat little trap for me, into which I am now walking, open-eyed, I may say. She—or some one who writes a neat feminine hand—has forwarded me a copy of a novel, with the suggestion that it contains much that will interest me. Now, of course, every law of prudence and wisdom leads me to take no notice of such communications, as a general rule—certainly not to give their senders free advertisement in these notes; but there is a certain novelty about this. A novel is more acceptable bait than a ticket for a picture show, and the reviewing of novels is not my business. For all of which reasons, and, further, that I have found the novel in question extremely interesting from the artistic point of view, I propose to walk, open-eyed, I repeat, into the trap neatly laid for me by the authoress, or some friend of the authoress, or, even it may be, by her enterprising publisher. Therefore, I say that the name of the book is "The Artistic Temperament," that it is written by a Miss Jane Wardle, though I have my doubts, for, with all respect to that lady, I may say that I never heard of her before, and that this book is certainly not the work of a novice, and that it is an uncommonly brilliant study of the effect that Art (with a big A) has upon those who take it too seriously.

I am not going to attempt to criticise the novel as a novel. I am not an authority on such matters, and whether it is good or bad as a novel I do not feel qualified to judge. Only I know that I sat up most of one night to finish it, that it made me laugh quite as often as anything I have read by our best-known contemporary humorists, and that there is not one of the characters, with the possible exception, I am glad to be able to say, of a man in possession, that I did not feel as though I might have met any day during the last week, so unusually life-like did they seem to me. But it is not as a novel, but as a study of the much discussed Artistic Temperament, that I am moved to write of this book, and as such it strikes me as about the most brilliant piece of satire that has been published this century. It shows you exactly the ill-effects of the Artistic Temperament upon various brands of humanity—upon the painter, who (and this is perhaps the least convincing feature of the book) is sufficiently prosperous to keep a man-servant, upon the pretty young Cockney wife of a City tradesman, upon a bank clerk, and so on, and so forth. The painter—I wish, by the way, his creator had given him a less artificial-sounding name than Cartmel—has the Artistic Temperament in a very common form—that is to say, he cultivates it with the utmost industry while mocking at it openly, and thus comes in time to the verge of shipwreck, whence he is only rescued by the much-enduring Philistines. Delia, the heroine, is another kind of sufferer. Having, from a typist, suddenly been raised to wealth, she is, of course, a very likely victim to the ravages of Art. She falls easily, and the description of her drawing-room at Tooting, with its attempted compromise between High Art and Philistine comfort, is a marvel of neatness and observation. The following description of the wall-decoration seems to me to crystallise the type of drawing-room uncommonly well: "At intervals around the walls were four Oriental plates, a colour-print of Sir Joshua Reynolds' 'Infant Samuel,' two of the Arundel Society's reproductions of works by Florentine masters, a photogravure of 'The Soul's Awakening,' and a coloured reproduction of Whistler's portrait of his mother. Modestly lurking on a table in a corner was a glass-case of stuffed birds, a smartly bound edition of Ruskin shared another, with odd copies of art magazines and a large gramophone, the brazen trumpet of which stuck out stiffly from the wall." It is one of the most significant points of this little epitome of the ravages of Art in Tooting and elsewhere, that the authoress does not include one original picture of any kind among the ill-assorted collection of reproductions she catalogues—a point which might profitably be impressed upon the minds of those who contemplate entering the profession of painting just now.

I cannot honestly say that "The Artistic Temperament" strikes me as a genial book. Perhaps Miss Wardle has been an artist herself; perhaps the ravages of artificial art weigh on her spirits as I have known them to weigh upon my own. Certainly she plants the arrows of her satire all around her. Peculiarly pleasant is her description of how the hero—originally one of those proud spirits who find it pays them to abuse the R.A.—after marrying a rich wife, becomes gradually reconciled to the official body and ends his career as P.R.A. and a baronet. Very soothing, again, is the character of Mr. Manwell, a bank clerk, who devotes his leisure hours to the works of Mr. Bernard Shaw, and who finally goes out of his mind. Again, I should very much like to quote some of the hero's obiter dicta upon the best way to make England an artistic country—which, to put it briefly, he thinks can only be done by exterminating the artists. And I should very much like to enter into speculations concerning the identity of Miss Jane Wardle—whom, if she will forgive me for saying so, I regard with considerable suspicion. So much so, indeed, that, were it not the height of impertinence to tell a lady that you don't believe her to be a real lady at all—I should like to ask her where she acquired her knowledge of young manhood, and especially of the way in which young men behave and talk when there are no ladies present. But it would be unprofitable, for, after all, the personality of the author matters nothing—it is the book that counts. And, though she has preferred to put her reflections into the form of a novel, and of what I take to be an uncommonly brilliant one at that, "The Artistic Temperament"—which, by the bye, is published by Alston

Scrubb & Co., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of their Cloudy Fluid Ammonia that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of Scrubb & Co. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

Rivers—certainly seems to me to contain some of the soundest common-sense condemnation of the artificial high-art tomfoolery that is doing so much to crush all real taste for art out of the country, that I have read in fiction or elsewhere.

MUSIC.

THE COMING OPERA SEASON.

THE Covent Garden prospectus which has now been issued holds out promise of an attractive season. If the menu includes no dish so piquant as, say, Strauss's "Salomé," plenty of good, solid fare of a more humdrum order is promised. For a beginning there will be, of course, the "special" performances of the "Ring" and "Die Meistersinger" under the now familiar "Bayreuth" conditions. Two cycles are to be given this season, opening with "Das Rheingold" on April 30, and the fact is emphasised that this year no "extra" cycles can be arranged. The arrangements will be as before, with an early start and a long dinner interval after the first act. Many would be better pleased, I fancy, if the latter were taken after the second act, which would give them dinner about eight o'clock instead of at the rather uncomfortable hour of half-past six; but the management evidently think otherwise. Dr. Richter will conduct these festival performances, of course. Several novelties and quasi-novelties are promised, as usual, among the former Mascagni's "Iris" and Catalani's "Loreley," while the latter will include Giordano's "Andrea Chenier" and "Fédora" and Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

"Andrea Chenier" was last heard at Covent Garden in 1905, when it was given during the San Carlo season with Zenatello and Sammarco in the leading parts. "Fédora," by the same composer, will be remembered as having been one of the operas given last autumn with Zenatello and Giachetti. A more recent work by Giordano, "Siberia," is said to be stronger than either of these, but that we may hear later, perhaps. Giordano, it may be recalled, first attracted notice by his one act opera "Marina," one of the unsuccessful works submitted in the great Sonzogno opera competition, which brought to light "Cavalleria Rusticana." Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" is a work of older date than these, of course, and was, indeed, given at Covent Garden as long ago as 1883. Since then it has not often been heard, but it was announced for performance during the last San Carlo season and would have been given then but for the indisposition of Mme. Nordica. It is Ponchielli's most popular work and was originally produced at La Scala, Milan, in 1876, and London opera goers will no doubt be pleased to renew acquaintance with its melodious strains. Ponchielli, it may be recalled, was for a time Puccini's teacher at the Milan Conservatoire. Mascagni's "Iris," which will be heard in London for the first time, is, like "Madama Butterfly," a Japanese opera. I remember hearing it some years ago in Germany, when I thought it rather dull. It is not a typical Mascagni opera at all. A feature of the music is the plentiful employment of Eastern intervals and colouring. Its effective prelude, supposed to be representative of sunrise in the East, has occasionally been given in the concert room. Catalani's "Loreley" is an interesting work by an Italian composer of the modern school, who died in 1893. Its music is light and imaginative and, by all accounts, pleasing.

For the rest it will be noted with pleasure that Verdi's "Otello" is to be revived, while many will be glad to see also that Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," which was done so recently during the German season, is to be repeated. On the other hand, not a few will observe with regret the omission of both "Lohengrin" and "Tristan" from the list this time. In the opinion of some, at least, "Tannhäuser" and "The Flying Dutchman" could have been spared more readily—to say nothing of "La Traviata," "Cavalleria Rusticana," and one or two other works in the list which might be named. But, then, it is not given to even the best intentioned management to please all parties. No mention is made, by the way, of the Ricordi prize English opera, which, according to the conditions of the competition, was to have been produced this season. Perhaps, however, matters are not yet sufficiently advanced to admit of a definite announcement regarding this.

As regards the singers, the list is sufficiently imposing, though in the case of sopranos one misses the names of Wittich and Ternina, also of Fräulein Von Mildenburg, whose re-engagement after her success last season was generally anticipated. Frau Gulbranson is apparently to be relied on as leading soprano in the heavier Wagnerian rôles. But "other engagements are pending," so that perhaps the list may be strengthened eventually in this respect. Otherwise, with Destinn, Giachetti, Kurz, and Melba, to name only a few, all appearing, the list of sopranos is not lacking in strength. Other well-known artists who have been engaged include Caruso, Herr Jörn, and Herr Kraus, among the tenors, who are also reinforced by a newcomer, Signor Bassi, of whom report speaks favourably; along with Messrs. Gilibert, Journet, Knüpfer, Sammarco, Scotti, Van Rooy, and others, who go to make up a particularly strong list of basses and baritones. The native singers engaged include Mme. Agnes Nicholls and Mme. Kirkby Lunn, who are now, of course, established favourites with Covent Garden audiences, together with Miss G. Lonsdale, Miss Maud Santley, Mme. Edna Thornton, and Mr. Frank Arthur. It is not a very extensive list, but one which, it may be hoped, will lengthen in time. Signor Campanini and Mr. Percy Pitt will share with Dr. Richter the duties of the conductor's chair.

Recent concerts have not been very remarkable. Christian Sinding was the bright particular star of the last Philharmonic, but the violin concerto which he brought forward, with the aid of M. Johannes Wolff as soloist, is not a very epoch-making composition. At the Queen's Hall Symphony concert on Saturday, Mr. Buhlig played finely in Beethoven's E flat concerto, and a very varied programme included also works by Mozart, Tchaikowsky, Strauss, and Sibelius. On the same afternoon Mr. Frederick Lamond played with his usual distinction and virility of style at the Bechstein Hall, and in the evening Mr. Gervase Elwes gave his postponed Brahms recital. His singing is refined, but inclined to effeminacy. The Royal Choral Society's recent performance of "The Kingdom" on Thursday drew a large audience, and was one of the best things which that rather unwieldy choir has done for some time. An interesting choral concert of another kind on the same evening was that devoted exclusively to Bach, which was given at the Æolian Hall, under the direction of Dr. Walford Davies, as one of the Broadwood series. The usual Irish concerts were given on St. Patrick's Eve (Saturday), Mr. Santley appearing at that given by Mr. William Saunders at the Crystal Palace. On Monday a performance of Brahms's "Requiem," the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the relief of the Berlin victims, was given by the London Choral Society, along with the first London performance of Mr. Dalhousie Young's "The Blessed Damozel," which contains some pleasing choral writing.

From far-away Detroit, U.S.A., inquiries have reached me lately concerning a certain Signor Giuseppe Bartolotta, who, it appears, is at present established in that city as professor of singing at the Michigan Conservatoire of Music. In a prospectus of that institution, which has been forwarded to me, Signor Bartolotta is described, I notice, as "the eminent Italian tenor . . . . . who has won universal distinction as a concert singer and teacher throughout Europe." Further, it is stated that "he has sung at the foremost concerts in England in conjunction with some of the most famous artists, including Patti, Melba, Kubelik, Paderewski, and others;" and in confirmation of these statements excerpts are appended of glowing notices ascribed to the Morning Post, Daily Telegraph, and other well-known papers. Now the odd thing is that diligent inquiry in London musical circles has so far failed to discover any one who has the smallest recollection of Signor Bartolotta having appeared here, still less of any singer of that name having achieved the remarkable success with which Signor Bartolotta is credited in the document above quoted. Apparently we have been entertaining an angel unawares, and no one can even recall that such a visit was ever paid. It is true we receive a great number of musical visitants —not always of the celestial order—in London, and it would be rash, perhaps, to assume that who is not remembered has necessarily never been here. Still, it is curious, to say the least, that an artist who is apparently of such commanding calibre as Signor Bartolotta has contrived to leave so little impression. I wonder if Mme. Patti, Mme. Melba, Herr Kubelik, and the rest would find themselves equally at a loss to recall the occasions upon which he has shared their triumphs. If so, the thing becomes "curioser and curioser." But doubtless the worthy Signor himself will be able to elucidate the mystery and supply those "fuller and further particulars," as the lawyers say, which the case would seem to demand.

Seeing the splendid work which he did as a great populariser of the best music in this country, and in particular on behalf of our native composers, it will be quite in accord with the fitness of things to do something to perpetuate the memory of the late Sir August Manns. Miss Fanny Davies, who first mooted the suggestion, will certainly not take it amiss that the same idea has been put forward independently by the Society of British Composers. Miss Fanny Davies's suggestion is that an exhibition might be founded for the encouragement and training of students in the art of conducting, which might be competed for in alternate years by students of the Royal College and Royal Academy respectively; and it would certainly not be easy to hit on a more useful and practical form which such a memorial might take.

The late Mr. Maurice Grau has been generally referred to as the American impresario, but he was by birth an Austrian, and in this country, at any rate, was best known by reason of his connection with Covent Garden, where he will be remembered as having been manager for a time after the death of Sir Augustus Harris. His career, like that of most others of his calling, was somewhat chequered, and though personally an amiable man, his responsibilities, even in the heyday of his success, always sat rather heavily upon him. Of late years matters had not gone well with him, and his death terminates a career which had recently known much disappointment. Such has been too often the lot of the impresario, whose feverish exertions during his lifetime are seldom rewarded by a happy end. Either it would seem, their fate is to fall upon evil times, deserted by all who paid them court in their days of triumph, or, like Sir Augustus Harris, they kill themselves by overwork and business worries.

Meanwhile, to pass from the dead to the living, the fierce rivalry continues in New York between Mr. Conried, Mr. Grau's successor at the Metropolitan Opera House, and Mr. Hammerstein, his rival at the Manhattan—the latter, it would appear, having scored the most recent point in the game by the engagement of Mme. Nordica for his next season. The struggle for the best singers which is being waged in New York at present must be excellent business for the latter, but we have no reason to regret that the same kind of cut-throat game is no longer being played in London. When opera can only just be made to pay its way at one opera house, it is not very easy to see how the result can be anything but disastrous in the long run when the attempt is made to keep it going in this fashion at two.

Congratulations to Mr. Georg Henschel on the announcement of his marriage. Like more than one music teacher before him, he is marrying one of his pupils, Miss Lewis by name. It is understood that the wedding took place on Saturday last in New York, and that Mr. Henschel will shortly be bringing his bride to England. Mr. Henschel has, I believe, recently had his abode in Boston, where, it may be recalled, he made his first reputation as a conductor some years ago as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is certainly one of the most versatile musicians living, being gifted alike as singer, pianist—Moscheles was his teacher under this head—composer and conductor; and though in the latter capacity he had to give up his work here, the popularity which orchestral music enjoys in London to-day may be ascribed in no little degree to the splendid pioneer work which he put in at a time when it was less generally appreciated.

The British singers' Berlin Fund has, it will be noticed with pleasure, made an excellent start with a first list of subscriptions totalling close on £100, a sum which will no doubt be largely augmented in due course. Twelve of the unfortunate artists lost were chorus singers, and a strong appeal is made accordingly for a response, in small contributions, from all the singers of our choral societies, musical comedy, and opera companies. The following singers have joined the committee of the Fund:—Mme. Marie Brema, Mrs. Henry J. Wood, David Bispham, Ben Davies, Gervase Elwes, D. Ffrangcon-Davies, George Grossmith, John Harrison, Robert Hilton, Dr. Theo Lierhammer, and Robert Radford. Subscriptions should be sent to the London and South-Western Bank, Oxford-street.

A generous response has also been elicited, I am glad to notice, by the appeal on behalf of Mme. Georgiana Burns, the Prince and Princess of Wales having led the way with donations of £5 each. Contributions in this case are being received by Mrs. Bagot, Levens Hall, Milnthorpe, Westmorland.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I suggested to you in a recent letter that "A Queen of Indiscretions" had every temptation, provocation, and extenuation that a woman could have for being indiscreet. But the hard case of Queen Caroline differs in degree only, not in kind, from the case of every other queen who marries for State reasons a man of whom she knows nothing, for whom she cares nothing, and from whom in the deadly dull routine of Court life she cannot escape. In Mrs. Colquhoun Grant's "Queen and Cardinal" (1), a memoir of Anne of Austria and of her relations with Cardinal Mazarin, you have another Royal, political, and uncongenial marriage, resulting in more than one indiscretion, and in one at least which was more than indiscreet. The most dangerous of her innocent indiscretions was that with "Steenie," the insolent, incapable, and despicable favourite of James and Charles, who, as he himself boasted, had been the lover of three queens, and, as Richelieu declared, was "equally dangerous to nations, kings, and husbands." That he should have been dangerous only to Anne of Austria was owing less to her virtue than to the lack of time and opportunity. Within a few hours of their first meeting Buckingham drew from her the avowal that he would have been her choice had she been free to choose, and within a week he had clasped her in his arms in a passionate embrace! Indeed, Buckingham's impudence was even sublime. Coolly leaving Henrietta Maria—the bride he was escorting home to his Sovereign, Charles—at the seashore, he hurried back to Paris, forced his way into the Louvre and into Anne's chamber at an hour when she was still in bed. "Falling on his knees beside her bed, he kissed the sheets with ardour, while inarticulate sobs broke from him as he bent his handsome head in an attitude of despair." Indeed, her ladies had great difficulty in putting an end to this sentimental scene. Anne's opportunities with Cardinal Mazarin were, of course, more free and frequent since in the days of this intrigue she was a widow and Queen Regent and he virtually sovereign of France; but here their very sovereignty—"a closely-watched slavery, mocked by the name of power"—to borrow Disraeli's description, embarrassed their amours. "I wish," sighed Anne to her one confidante, Mme. de Motteville—"I wish it was always night—not that I can sleep, but then at least I can have solitude and silence." If she had been confined in the Bastille, she could hardly have had less liberty than the rigorous routine of a routine-ridden court allowed her. No sooner did she wake in the morning than her bedroom was invaded by a crowd of the principal officers and gentlemen of the court. When she had at last got rid of these, the ladies who co-operated with her in her charitable schemes were admitted to a council. When this council broke up she was allowed time for breakfast, and after breakfast for her toilet, "when the little king (afterwards Louis XIV.) was allowed to hand her her chemise, which he kissed tenderly before presenting it." The afternoon was given to visiting charitable institutions and to the reception of all the princesses and ladies of quality. Then came her one hour of happiness in the day when the Cardinal was admitted to a private audience. That over, she had, with the Cardinal, to pass through the Grand Cabinet and honour with a word or two each of the crowd of courtiers which thronged it. Supper followed, where her ladies waited upon her, not without an eye to what she ate and drank, since they had to be content with her leavings, "to finish the Queen's bread, drink up her wine, and use her serviette!" Then at last she was allowed to retire to enjoy the solitude and silence of a sleepless night. Even the Cardinal was a disappointment to her, since his return of her love was rather perfunctory and diplomatic than personal. When she attended him day and night upon his death-bed he treated her as an officious sick nurse, and once exclaimed irritably, "This woman will kill me with her importunities. Will she never leave me in peace?" More illustrative still of the ordinary loneliness and lovelessness of a queen's life is Mrs. Colquhoun Grant's description of the marriage of Princesse Marie de Gonzague to the King of Poland. It is only right to say, however, that the princess had a fair forewarning of her future life when the semi-savages, sent as the Polish King's ambassadors to seek her hand, were presented to her. These gentlemen wore no linen, and, indeed, dispensed with sheets as well as shirts. They went to bed naked, wrapped in furs, "and were extremely dirty." However, being intoxicated with the idea of becoming a queen, she accompanied them back to Poland, expecting as a spoiled beauty to be received with rapture by her royal bridegroom. Here, however, is the account of her reception:—

> When at last she found herself in the presence of the King she was shocked to see an old gouty, enormously fat man unable to move about with comfort. He awaited her in the cathedral in Warsaw, seated in a chair from which he did not attempt to rise. She knelt before him and kissed his hand, but he showed no pleasure whatever in seeing her. He looked at her fixedly and, turning to the ambassador, De Bregi, who was standing beside him, said aloud, "Is this the beauty of whom you gave me such a glowing description?"

The historical student, as Mrs. Colquhoun Grant admits, must look elsewhere for a study of any reach and depth of Cardinal Mazarin's France; but those who love a look behind the scenes into the life of a Court will fine this volume very interesting.

Mrs. Mary Mann's "The Memories of Ronald Love" (2) is the most poignantly pathetic, I might say, poignantly painful, story of the life of an ill-starred, ill-reared, and ill-used child that ever was written. It is harrowing, and, I think, inartistically harrowing. Surely there ought to be some break in the clouds, some "green isle in the deep, wide sea of misery" from the point of view of art alone, to say nothing of the relief to the o'ercharged heart? But there is no relief, not even of a hope that the story or the characters are exaggerated, since Mrs. Mann does not over-colour even the fiendish Miss Pergaman. The most striking thing in the book is the sympathy, almost Dickensian, with which Mrs. Mann sees and makes you see every person and thing through the eyes of a little child. Whether you will or will not be disappointed in Mr. Mason's "Running Water" (3) depends upon whether you have or have not been a mountain climber. The chapters which have to do with this form of athletic frenzy are so spirited as to infect you with it; but I doubt if you will consider the rest of the book up to the high level Mr. Mason has led you to expect in a novel from his pen. You may expect much from Mr. Ashton Hilliers, whose first novel, "Memoirs of a Person of Quality" (4)—if I may call it a novel—is the most promising piece of fiction I have read for years. Mr. Ashton Hilliers has so saturated himself with the spirit of the eighteenth century that you believe as you read at once in the genuineness and in the authenticity of these "extracts from certain journals written at different times by my great-uncle, the Hon. George Augustus Frederick Chorley Fanshawe, wherein are given the authentic particulars of his connection with the —th Regiment of Dragoon Guards, his breach with his family, residence among the Yorkshire Quakers, his restoration to society, etc." The very discursiveness and incoherence of the narrative seem to testify to its genuineness as the reminiscences of a person of quality, conscious of the planetary importance of all that concerned himself and his family. Mr. Ashton Hilliers has come to stay. "Her Father's Soul" (5), after his death and her birth, passed in some mysterious way into his daughter, making her ineffably pure, with a purity, however, which could hardly have been hereditary, since she was the offspring of an adulterous intrigue between her parents. Such was this ineffable purity that she died upon the day of her marriage, so sparing her father another reincarnation. "Her Father's Soul," in a word, is the most preposterous hotch-potch of theosophy that you probably have ever read.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Mr. John Murray has sent me the prospectus of "The Letters of Queen Victoria," which—as announced in Truth some time ago—will be published in the autumn, probably in October. There will be three volumes. The first covers the correspondence of the Queen till the age of nearly twenty-five; the second, the period of the repeal of the Corn Laws, the foreign revolutions, the disruption of the old Whig Party, and the fiasco of Chartism; the third deals with the Eastern question, the Crimean war, the Indian Mutiny, the Franco-Austrian war, and the struggle for a United Italy. The selection terminates with the death of the Prince Consort. Throughout, the object of the editors, Mr. A. C. Benson and Lord Esher, has been not so much to present a compendium of political history as to show the personality of the Queen, her method of approaching and deciding questions, her outlook, her sympathies, her shrewdness, her perseverance, her diligence. The book will, of course, be published by the authority of the King. It will be illustrated with numerous portraits.

In a preface to his new book, "Behold the Days Come" (Methuen, price 3s. 6d.), the Hon. and Rev. James Adderley announces for the guidance of reviewers that "this is a tract, not a novel." He quickly adds, however, that this does not mean that "it deals with little choir boys who steal apples and then get consumption and repent on the advice of a district visitor," or any such themes as that. Really it is a story with a purpose—an attempt to show that the Socialist movement, if it is to succeed, must not oppose Christianity, but work with it; an appeal to the wealthy and educated classes to take the Labour movement seriously, and to co-operate with it in facing the social problems of the day. Father Adderley remarks that the people in his story are very ordinary people, who talk quite ordinary language: "That's where I am no novelist." But this "tract" will be found richer in humour and altogether more readable than the average novel, despite its serious purpose, and it will be surprising if "Behold the Days Come" does not eclipse the success of the author's previous story, "Stephen Remarx."

Miss Florence Warden's new novel, "The Man with the Amber Eyes," which Mr. John Long is publishing, has a mystifying plot which, it is predicted, even the most experienced reader will fail to pierce before he reaches the end of the book.

The Sheridan family have placed a large amount of hitherto unused material at the disposal of Mr. Walter Sichel for the biographical and critical study of Richard Brinsley Sheridan upon which he is now engaged. The book will be published by Messrs. Constable and Co.

Several novels by well-known writers will be issued by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett next month. The list includes "Needles and Pins" (a sequel to "If I were King"), by Justin Huntly McCarthy, "Colonel Daveron," by Percy White, "The Flying Cloud," by Morley Roberts, "The Strongest of All Things," by Mme. Albanesi, and "Short Cruises," a new volume of stories by W. W. Jacobs.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus have in the press a work by Dr. A. S. Rappoport entitled "The Curse of the Romanovs (1796-1825)," which is to a large extent based on hitherto unpublished records. They also have in preparation an authorised English version of M. Batiffol's "Marie de Médicis and the Court of France in the Seventeenth Century," and "Artists of the Italian Renaissance," by Miss E. L. Seeley, a companion volume to her "Stories of the Italian Artists"; while in their new series of colour books this firm will issue, on April 4, "Venice," by Mrs. de Selincourt and Mrs. Sturge-Henderson, with illustrations after water-colour drawings by Mr. Reginald Barratt, A.R.W.S. Messrs. Chatto and Windus announce that they now publish the well-known series of "The King's Classics," to which, under the general editorship of Professor Gollancz, a number of important additions will be made. In May a new series entitled "The Shakespeare Classics," being reprints of the romances, novels, and plays used by Shakespeare as the sources of his plays, will be commenced.

The Baroness Orczy's romance, "The Scarlet Pimpernel," is being brought out by Messrs. Greening and Co. in a popular edition, price 1s. The story has now been translated into German, Swedish, Italian, Hungarian, and Dutch, and the play founded upon this extremely successful book has also been very popular. Messrs. Greening announce a new book, entitled "Pen, Patron, and Public," which will, it is anticipated, create a considerable stir in journalistic and literary circles. The author deals somewhat audaciously with literary and journalistic life behind the scenes, and throws an interesting light on the history of several great newspapers.

"The Cosy Corner Library" is the title of a new series of charming little volumes, price half-a-crown each, which Messrs. Gay and Bird have begun with the issue of "Love Letters of Famous People," chosen and arranged by Freeman Bunting, and "The Power of Gems and Charms," by G. H. Bratley.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—We paid a rather belated visit to the South African Products Exhibition in Vincent-square last week, and were sorry we had not gone before, so interesting did we find it. The very first thing that struck us was a beautiful picture of the veldt, with a line of dark blue hills on the horizon. The next was the silver tree, with its lovely grey leaves quite white in the high lights; and after these the maps of Africa in 1894 and three other years, showing the wonderful way in which the pink of the British possessions has swallowed up the other colours. The Victoria Falls, shown in large photographs, next attracted us. Niagara has to take a back seat, and have its tea in a mug, in competition with this marvellous mass of water. It must be a most wonderful sight. They had begun to sell the fresh fruits the day we were there, and this was a great chance for us. I have never seen such enormous purple plums. Pines of every size were a tempting item. The pears were of a different shape from ours, much longer, more slender, and inclined to slope sideways at the top.

The catalogue informed our minds for us. From it and its illustrations, we learned that the sugar cane is thrice the height of the men who work in the fields; that bananas grow in clusters at the end of long branches of the trees; that mealies are merely maize, or corn cobs, and that the ostrich is by no means the smart and curly bird that one imagines it. Lank and limp are its drooping feathers, giving it a dissipated "out-all-night" appearance. The length of its legs and the extent of its neck give its body the aspect of being slung midway between the two extremities for the better convenience of carrying it. There is nothing decorative about the bird that supplies us with such ornamental feathers.

The South African Women's Industries was full of interest. The embroideries and old Huguenot laces were quite out of the common, and the examples of fish-scale embroidery were very fascinating, as were also those of fretwork in high relief and chiefly depicting the effective rooi flower. On a table lay a waltz, "Couleur de Rose," composed by Miss Frances W. Cloete, of Alphen, Cape Colony, Hon. Sec. of the Women's Industrial Exhibition. You may remember her charming "Fraises Ecrasées" waltz some years ago. "Couleur de Rose" is even better, more spirited, the time well marked, the melody more "singing," delightful to dance to. It is published by Cramer and Co. The Queen accepted a copy and Miss Cloete felt greatly honoured, she told us, as the only South African composer represented in the Exhibition. The Coldstream Guards played it frequently at Windsor and Buckingham Palace, and also a Berceuse by the same composer; and the King's Colonials' orchestra played them daily at the Exhibition.

The Exhibition goes on to Holland, where it will naturally be a source of intense interest.

On the same afternoon we attended the opening of the English Women's Home Industries, started for the employment of skilled gentlewomen in their own homes. It is quite time that English ladies of fallen fortunes were looked after. There are Scottish, Welsh, and Irish Home Industries, and it seems unfair that the ladies of this land should be omitted. The Dowager Duchess of Wellington heads the list of patronesses, a very influential one. The Principal is Mrs. Betty Eeles, and the Secretary Miss Elinor Deane. One sentence in the prospectus struck me very particularly. It runs:—

> We hold that there should be no need of King's Funds, Queen's Funds, or Lord Mayor's Funds if Englishwomen would always buy English-made goods where possible. The only people in this rich country who ought to need charity are the aged and the sick.

The management of the English Women's Home Industries appeals to those who like dainty surroundings and beautiful, fine clothing, to support the venture by giving orders for the skilled work offered them. "The only real means of helping distressed gentlewomen is for gentlewomen in easier circumstances to unite for this purpose." Specimens of the work can be seen at the office, 76, Upper Gloucester-place, N.W., on any day except Saturdays and Sundays, between eleven and four. Estimates are given for trousseaux, layettes, or single articles, as well as for house decoration, furnishing, catering for evening parties, dinners, etc. The principal industry is ladies' and children's outfitting in all its branches, but besides this there are English real laces, millinery, dressmaking, jewellery, enamels, toilet articles, leather work, artistic bookbinding, etc., etc., etc., all of the most up-to-date description. Make a mental note of the address.

I wrote you some time ago that Linda was looking so slim and neat, quite a contrast to her robust and comfortable proportions of a year ago. We teased her and asked her how she had done it, but she always answered "Nothing." However, we were out shopping together the other morning, and Linda called in at Sykes Josephine's to inquire about a pair of their new krutoid corsets, which are so made as to be non-stretchable round the waist, though moderately elastic above and below it. The effect of this upon the figure must be seen to be believed. They are particularly useful for golf, riding, tennis, etc. Sykes Josephine have the monopoly of this krutoid material, and no one who wishes to look slim should fail to invest in their petticoat tops in krutoid, also those in doeskin. We had a look at their blouses, always so beautifully finished and so tastefully trimmed. One, in Valenciennes, had little rouleaux of pale blue satin with a Louis XVI. bow of the same at the neck, and dear little hanging ends in the form of fuchsias, with smaller ones on the sleeves. A comparatively inexpensive blouse was in torchon relieved with Valenciennes. Then there were silk blouses, among them a black glacé with dainty white front and a little crossing vest in printed coloured velvet, so smart and chic. This is one of the few shops in London where blouses are kept ready made in all sizes, even to a fifty-two inch round the shoulders. It is so nice to know of a place where a well-proportioned, well-cut blouse can be had, ready to put on at a moment's notice. We noticed a very graceful teagown in white ninon over soft pink silk, and trimmed with guipure outlined with rouleaux of satin. There was a dear little lace overbodice with sleeves to match, short, of course. Washing moirette petticoats, we were told, are one of their novelties, very cheap; and another item which will commend itself to everybody takes the form of long lace sleeves, like mittens, but with no thumb-hole, suitable for wearing with short-sleeved blouses or bodices. They are in black as well as white, are in pretty designs, and are long enough to cover the arm from wrist to above the elbow. Only three half-crowns a pair, too.

The opera season is to open on April 30, and will last for thirteen weeks, closing July 29. These thirteen weeks are the top crust of that unique and wonderful whirlpool, the London season, which agglomerates the best of everything portable (including genius of various sorts) from all over the world. Whether it be new music, a new picture, a new commercial invention, a discovery in science, an exploration of some unknown tract of country, an infant phenomenon, or anything else that is remarkable, it comes to London, the heart and brain of the world, to be inspected and pronounced upon. Other capitals are looked to for opinions on certain subjects—Petersburg for singers, Berlin for mathematics, metaphysics, and some kinds of special medical skill, Paris for dress and cookery and the fine arts, Vienna for the top sparkle of smartness and social gifts; but to London comes every good thing of every kind. And all has to be crowded into the three months of the season. Small wonder that exhaustion, physical and mental, sets in about the third week in July, synchronously with the very hot weather, usually at its climax about that time. It is then that we all begin to "babble of green fields," and that the very name of a purling brook or a country lane or a vicarage garden sets us longing for things rural.

You do not throw away your old magazines and weekly papers, do you? Nor your paper-covered books when they become so shabby as to disgrace your neat bookshelves? Make them into parcels and send them to the Kyrle Society, 2, Manchester-street, London, W. I see that Lord Monkswell is appealing for books and periodicals in the papers. But do not omit to prepay the cost of carriage. The Society cannot afford to defray this. But it sends collecting baskets by carrier to any address in the Metropolitan area if notified that there are books, etc., to be given to the Society. This saves all the trouble of packing and sending off.

This reminds me to remark that London does not yet possess a perfect carrier system, though there are so many companies of the kind. The would-be sender of a parcel or box does it up and labels it and puts a carrier's card in the window. Then he has to wait to catch the speaker's eye, as it were. The carrier may see the card and call, or he may not. And when he comes he seems to have no fixed charge for conveying parcels. For a small hamper, for instance, one company charges 4d., another 6d. The amount seems to be left entirely to the discretion of the man with the van. There should be, surely, a scale of charges by dimensions, unless the weight be extraordinarily and unusually great. The present haphazard way offers temptation to dishonesty on the part of servants. I have always found them a particularly honest class, but that is no reason that they should be exposed to temptation, especially in the case of very young girls.

The Horse Show at Olympia will be one of the sensations of the season. It is to begin on June 7 and end June 13. All London will be flocking to it. The harness of one of the American teams is to be lit up with electricity. Horses are coming from all over the world. The list of prizes reaches a high figure. A high jump competition is to be held every evening, and handsome prizes offered on each of the seven nights. It will be most exciting.

Have you seen that we are not to have sixpenny fares for cabs in London? Eightpence is to be the minimum. I cannot fancy myself proffering this precise sum to a cabby. I am so dreadfully afraid of him that I always give him more than his fare. It is a species of cowardice that I share with the stronger sex. I am quite certain that if it were a question with Richard of doing without his evening smoke or giving a cabby his exact fare, he would prefer the former alternative, hard as it would be.

We went to the Hunters' Improvement Society's Show at the Agricultural Hall last week. It is always delightful to see real fine upstanding English hunters. We timed our visit for the parade of winners and the jumping competition, which was most exciting and amusing. To my great pleasure and intense interest I found that our seats were near enough to the Royal box for me to see the Queen, the Dowager Empress of Russia, and the Prince and Princess of Wales quite easily. As one of the strong charactered women of the world who will live in history, the Dowager Empress fascinated my gaze; happily I was just far enough away to look long and hard with no fear of discovery. There is a certain likeness to our handsome Queen, but the faces are yet most unlike. The Queen was so amused with the horses and their pranks before they would condescend to show their prowess. Time and again she spoke to her sister, trying to enlist her sympathy in her own pleasure. It was useless. The Empress spoke once or twice to the Prince of Wales and occasionally to Lady Lansdowne, but never smiled or looked alert or even alive—hers is a mask-like face. As the Royal sisters drove away, the Queen was bowing right and left in response to the handkerchief-waving and cheers of the crowd. The Empress sat back sphinx-like and looked on. What, we wondered, did she think of the looks of love and almost passionate admiration on the faces round for her sister, whose sway is all of love, whose only public actions are done in the cause of charity or of duty?

I have received the following from Mona:—

My dear Madge,—You want flowers for large vases; then you cannot do better than grow gladioli. They are beautiful in any position or for any purpose, and they last an unusually long time in water if the spikes are cut when two or three of the lowest flowers are open, for all the others above them open in succession. The choice, too, is very great. There are about 140 different species, and innumerable varieties. Very few of the original species, however, are now grown; they have been almost entirely superseded by the beautiful hybrids raised during the last thirty years in this country, in America, and especially in France. MM. Lemoine and Sons, of Nancy, were the first to see the possibilities of the genus, and it is largely to their efforts that the improvement in the present race is due. By crossing G. gandavensis (itself a hybrid between G. psittacinus and either G. cardinalis or G. oppositifolius) and G. purpureo-auratus, they obtained the group of exquisite hybrids known as Lemoinei, and by crossing one of these and G. Saundersii they originated another fine group, to which the name nanceianus has been given. The gandavensis hybrids form another group, one of the oldest, but still one of the most beautiful, being the scarlet brenchleyensis; while a fourth, which was raised in America a few years ago, is Childsi, perhaps the handsomest of all. One more group deserves mention—G. colvillei—a hybrid between G. cardinalis and G. tristis. It is dwarf and early, and its white variety, the Bride, is grown in enormous quantities for Covent Garden. You may see great bunches of it in the florists' windows in spring and early summer.

G. colvillei is the earliest. The gandavensis and nanceianus hybrids flower normally in June and July, and the Lemoinei and Childsi hybrids in July and August, the latter sometimes as late as September. But it is easy to prolong the flowering period by planting at different times. If, for example, gandavensis corms—a corm, by the way, is an upright tuber without the scales or fleshy leaves which are characteristic of bulbs—are planted at fortnightly intervals from the middle of March to the end of May, they will flower in succession from June to October. In any case, do not waste them by scattering them about the garden, as is often done, but plant them in large groups—the corms from 9in. to a foot apart, and about 4in. deep. If a little sand is laid under each—and this I recommend for all bulbous plants, especially if the soil is at all heavy—it will facilitate the formation of roots and consequently induce more vigorous growth and finer flowers.

Gladioli succeed best in a rich, well-drained, sandy loam, and during the growing period they require a great deal of moisture. In a dry summer they are liable to be attacked by red spider, a reddish-brown insect so small that it can scarcely be seen with the naked eye. If the leaves begin to turn brown prematurely its presence may be regarded as certain, and the plants should be frequently syringed and the ground soaked with water. If that is not sufficient a solution of soft soap should be applied with the syringe, and washed off a few hours later. It is rather a pity that gladioli need supports, but if care is exercised the sticks are not obtrusive, and they prevent all chance of damage by strong winds. I have not said anything about the price, because this varies greatly, some of the named varieties (the new ones especially) being expensive, while the unnamed are comparatively cheap. The latter, if obtained from a trustworthy firm, are quite good enough for ordinary purposes. I have looked through the lists of named varieties in three or four catalogues, and the varieties named in any one and recommended as the best are different from those in the others. It is, therefore, difficult to avoid the conclusion that each firm selects certain varieties, gives its own names to them, and then offers them at high prices, just as a patent medicine firm gives a fancy name to some cheap salt, or combination of salts, and then charges for it at an exceedingly high rate. Sometimes, of course, these named varieties may be better than the unnamed, but not always; and, as I said before, I recommend you to buy the latter. You will get far more for your money, and if any of them do happen to be poor, you can easily weed them out.

This weeding-out is important, if you are to keep your stock select. It may seem a sacrifice, but only the really good are worth growing, and the increase is so rapid that the others are not missed. When the old corms are lifted in autumn, there will be found around them a huge number of tiny ones, which should be carefully collected and stored by themselves. If planted in a reserve bed in spring and treated in the ordinary way, many of them will be large enough to flower in the following year. Gladioli may also be propagated by means of seeds sown very thinly in pans in March and placed in the greenhouse. The young plants should be thinned out if necessary, and should be allowed to grow the whole year without disturbance. Next spring the little corms may be planted out, and this must be repeated for two or three years until they reach flowering size. The process, you see, is a slow one, but it is undoubtedly interesting. There is always the chance of drawing a big prize in the lottery—of raising some plant of extraordinary merit. I cannot say, however, that so far we have been exceptionally fortunate, though we grow many thousands of seedlings of all kinds every year. To give you some idea of the patience required by the hybridist, to say nothing of the labour which he must be prepared to undertake, I will mention the experience of Dr. Van Fleet, of New Jersey. Out of 150,000 seedling gladioli raised by him in the course of sixteen years he obtained only two which he considered worth naming and putting into commerce. One of these is Princeps, which I see described in one catalogue as a "magnificent bright scarlet variety of enormous size," priced at a shilling each. The other—Lord Fairfax—I cannot find in any list. Is it surprising, then, that new-named varieties are often costly?—Your affectionate cousin,

Mona.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Life is a succession of beginnings and endings, and how quickly the latter seem to follow on the former, especially as we advance in years—an advancement, by the way, which none of us struggle for, yet all, who live for it, attain. The chapters grow shorter and shorter as we progress along the path of life, until beginnings and endings seem to be hurrying on, overtaking and overlapping each other. There is no "at length, it ringeth to evensong," in the days of what may be gently called—the later period of youth; time never dallies on the way in their case, but just "runs through," however rough they may be. Does not the coming of the spring and the passing of the winter turn one's thoughts in this direction? It seems but the other day that Christmas was still lingering with us, and now we are deep in preparations for Easter. Our rest after a prolonged Christmas holiday is hardly over before it is time to set off on a strenuous Easter one. The young "rush" life, but life "rushes" the others.

The Castle season, which began at the end of January, finished last week. The ball on Friday, given in honour of the national saint, as well as the State official dinner on Saturday, anticipated his festival. Lady Aberdeen's slight relapse of illness after the Lace Ball made her still poorly last week, but the programme of entertainment was gone through by Lord Aberdeen, helped by his family and the Viceregal party and staff. It was a pity that Lady Aberdeen was not able to preside at the end of a "season" which was so successful throughout, and owed so much of its success to her energy and thoughtfulness. Dinner parties were given throughout the week, and a select dance on Tuesday, which was much enjoyed by those who were at it, and caused much lamentation amongst those who were not. And what a jealous watch Court guests keep on one another. Everyone knows how often everyone else has been at entertainments, and everyone has such excellent reasons for being asked to as many parties as everyone else. But who can hold the balance even? Even Irish land values are not more difficult to determine than social ones. St. Patrick's Ball, to which everyone can go uninvited who has been at a Levee or Drawing-room in the season, was not as crowded as might have been expected under the circumstances. Full Court dress was worn, the ladies, of course, being an exception as regarded the wear of trains. The ballroom-in-chief, St. Patrick's Hall, was a picturesque sight, brilliant with uniforms as well as with the brilliant costumes of our sex. Diamond stars, orders, decorations and ribbons also in many cases added to the brilliancy of masculine attire, whilst feathers, lappets and veils were an extra—a considerable one they looked in dancing—in the headdresses of matron and maid. One wonders, considering their universal wear by savage humanity, if feathers are a "touch of nature" that "makes the whole world kin." The ball was opened by the traditional country dance, Lord Aberdeen dancing with Lady Mayo, and the Chamberlain (Lord Hawkesbury) with Lady Grenfell. His Excellency was resplendent in full Highland dress, with stars and orders; two pages in St. Patrick's blue and Irish crochet were in attendance on him. Lord Grenfell was a much decorated figure, too. Lord and Lady Portarlington, the latter beautifully dressed and glittering with jewels, made their first appearance, since their marriage, at Dublin Castle. Lord and Lady Massereene had come from their residence, Oriel Temple, for the occasion. Lady Blanche Seymour was amongst the party from the Royal Hospital. Her sisters, Ladies Hersey, Edina and Mildred Conyngham, were among the large number of pretty girls who met the eye on all sides. Whatever changes our changeful country goes through, it keeps steadfastly to the tradition of girlish beauty. One does see such lovely eyes and beautiful complexions, and all home grown and not imported. Irish and Scotch reels were danced during the evening with great effect, the officers of the Black Watch and of the Cameron Highlanders being the partners in the latter. Lord Aberdeen took part in the dancing with much vigour, and also in promoting the enjoyment of his guests. On Saturday the full-dress banquet took place in St. Patrick's Hall. On this occasion, too, the ladies had to wear feathers and lappets or veils, not the most convenient of head-dresses at a dinner.

This week is a quiet one, and the next will be still quieter, of course. Society rarely wakes up to the fact that Lent is going on until it is going off, until the last week comes. Then, and then only, festivities are in abeyance.

The Dowager Lady Dufferin and Lady Hermione Blackwood were in Dublin last week to attend a meeting to start the Women's National Health Association of Ireland, also patronised by Lady Aberdeen. Lord Aberdeen presided in Lady's Aberdeen's enforced absence. Lady Hermione Blackwood is a very practical philanthropist, who, having gone through a hospital nurse training in London, now works amongst the poor women in the County of Down and neighbourhood of Clandeboye. How one must admire such zeal and thoroughness in helping those who need help so much. A noble life, truly, is it not?—Yours ever, Clare.

I shall have some nice recipes for you next week, dear.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

"French as spoken in France."

"QU'EST-CE QUE CELA VEUT DIRE?"

BY

H. P. SLIGO DE POTHONIER.

An interesting and invaluable Book for those who study French and those who teach it.

Published by SANDS & CO.

Price 3/6 net.

Well reviewed in the "Journal des Débats," Paris, May 2nd, 1906. Also mentioned and praised in 25 of the best English Newspapers.

Useful to Travellers.

PRESS NOTICE.

"The careful English student of the French language may have mastered its grammar, its syntax, its pronunciation, and its idioms; he may pride himself on being an adept in French conversation, and yet, when in actual intercourse with Frenchmen, he may find himself again and again pulled up by some particular phrase which has a nicety of meaning that he is quite unable to grasp. It is to relieve difficulties of this sort—difficulties that even French people feel after some years' absence from their native land—that Mrs. H. P. Sligo de Pothonier has gathered together in a handy little volume a large number of difficult words which are scrupulously indexed, and set in sentences that explain their significance. . . . Mrs de Pothonier's phrase book which is entitled 'Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire?' will serve as a most informing and indeed invaluable guide to students."—Sunday Times, May 6th, 1906.

WHY HAIR LOSES ITS CONDITION.

THE FOLLY OF SUPPOSING A DOZEN DISORDERS CAN BE TREATED WITH ONE REMEDY.

Of your whole body your hair is the part most affected by the conditions under which you live. Contrary to general opinion, it is a most complicated and delicate organism, and from its exposed position is exceptionally liable to the attacks of the myriads of micro-organisms and minute but destructive vegetable spores that fill the atmosphere.

It is assaulted in many ways. And as each different attack requires a different defence, the various specific preparations, whether advertised for external or for internal use, and which claim to cure all and every disorder that the hair has suffered from in the past, is suffering in the present, and will suffer in the time to come, must necessarily be useless.

The disorders from which hair is liable to suffer may roughly be divided into four groups—those which cause Baldness, those which cause Greyness, those which lead to Scurf, and those which bring on Irritation of the Scalp. Let us just take as an example the first of these. Baldness may be caused by a certain vegetable parasite which lodges on the hair shaft and deprives it of its nourishment; it may be due to scurf pressing on the tender hair-roots and pressing it nearly to death; it may be due to the hair becoming too greasy and rotting away, or to its being too dry, and therefore breaking, splitting and crumbling away. It may be due to the skin of the scalp being too loose, or to its being too tight and squeezing their vitality out of them, or, again, it may be caused by atrophy of the hair bulb. In nearly all of these cases Baldness is curable, but it stands to reason that all these different forms of the disorder cannot be cured by the same specific remedy.

What you want is knowledge. You may obtain this free of all charge. It is contained in that fully illustrated book, "The Hair," written by Mr. Warner Oliver, consultant on disorders of the hair, of 4, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, London, W. Write for it. It contains no puff or advertisement of any cure-all hair restorative. Mr. Warner Oliver believes in prescribing an individual remedy for an individual disorder, and the thousands of cases of hair-trouble he has successfully treated proves that he is correct.

Mr. Warner Oliver will send you this interesting book free of all charge or obligation; he only asks you to mention this paper and say whether you are Rev., Mr., Mrs., Miss, or title, in order that it may be correctly addressed.

HUTCHINSON'S NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE CRUISE OF THE MAKE-BELIEVES

By TOM GALLON

"The plot is original and whimsical, the characters are deftly drawn and cleverly contrasted. The situations are amusing and sometimes irresistibly ludicrous. But a sweet dignity always surrounds Bessie, who is one of the most charming heroines of recent fiction. In none of his books has Mr. Tom Gallon displayed a richer or more delicate fancy than in this delightful story."—Scotsman.

2nd EDITION

ADAM'S CLAY

By COSMO HAMILTON

"In this impressive and outspoken novel Mr. Cosmo Hamilton makes a marked advance in reputation and in knowledge of the essentials of the novelists' art. In 'Adam's Clay' he has burst the bonds of mere surface cleverness, and has dared to paint life in the strong colours that certain aspects of the Human Comedy inevitably demand. It is worthy of Balzac."—Standard.

THE RETURN OF RICHARD CARR

2nd EDITION

PEGGY THE PILGRIM

By G. B. BURGIN

"In delineating Peggy, Mr. Burgin has excelled. We have rarely followed with greater pleasure the course of a character in modern fiction than the development of the little lodging house slave into a clever, beautiful, and supremely unselfish woman, who, though of the world, is without a suspicion of worldliness. All the personages depicted in the novel are admirably presented, but Peggy stands supreme not only by reason of the part she plays but for the delicacy and refinement of her characterisation. Mr. Burgin has written a book which may be read with keen interest."—Birmingham Post.

THE ANGEL AND THE OUTCAST

By G. COLMORE

"The study of the noble Mary Ann and the splendid Police Court Missionary is interesting and appealing, besides having a genuine flavour about it. But by far the most memorable thing in the book is the almost intolerable picture of the slaughter-houses of England and the cruelties practised in them. All England went into hysterics over the dangers of tinned meat after the publication of 'The Jungle.' It remains to be seen whether the sufferings of the cattle we consume will rouse anyone to help in the vitally-needed reform."—Standard.

"The writer roughly drags aside the veil which a discreet diplomacy had drawn over the truth, and gives us . . . a book remarkable alike for its sincerity, its dramatic power, and its amazing indiscretion. RHEUMATISM

No Cure—No Pay.

The cure for Rheumatism is simple and certain in 99 per cent. of cases with Anturic Bath Salts. They act in the natural way. They dissolve and draw the poisonous uric acid out of your system through the pores of the skin. All you have to do is to use them in your bath. Warm, pleasant, invigorating treatment—no drugs to take, no dieting necessary—no plasters or liniments required.

Anturic Bath Salts cure in every case where a cure is possible. Where they fail we refund your money.

For a mild attack of Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, or Sciatica—any uric acid disease—three or four tins of Anturic Salts should be sufficient. Where, however, the disease has become chronic, four times this quantity may be required, but in either case the first few baths will give relief. Should no benefit result, send us a certificate to this effect from your medical adviser, also the lids of the tins you have used, together with the Chemist's receipt for those you have bought, and we will refund your money.

Remember, no cure—no pay, when you use

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,469.

I propose, this week, to set another Puzzle of a plébiscite character, as I find that such Puzzles are always immensely popular with readers of TRUTH. The last Puzzle we had, of this sort, dealt with works of fiction. But now I am going to make an incursion into the pages of history, and to offer the usual Prize of Two Guineas for the best solution of the following comprehensive problem:—

WHO WERE THE FOUR GREATEST MEN IN THE HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT WORLD DOWN TO THE CHRISTIAN ERA? AND WHO HAVE BEEN THE FOUR GREATEST MEN SINCE THAT DATE?

There will be no limitations to the scope of this exhaustive inquiry, which embraces the world's history from the creation (or evolution) of man down to the present time.

Moreover, the precise meaning of the term "greatest men," in this connection, will be left entirely to the discretion of competitors. They may be statesmen, warriors, poets, authors in fact, any men of any description who have left their mark on the pages of History.

The Prize will be awarded to that competitor whose list of eight "greatest men" shall most nearly approximate to the "ideal" list arrived at by collating all lists sent in.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No competitor must send in more than one list.

(ii) All lists must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, April 1, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of ARACHNE, winner of one quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,460, is Miss A. M. Halsey, London Road, Liphook.

 The real name, with the address, of WHIG, winner of one-quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,460, is J. M. Heathcote, Esq., Conington Castle, Peterborough.

WHIG very kindly desires me to hand over his Prize-money (10s. 6d.) to the TRUTH Toy Fund; for which act of self-abnegation, in a good cause, I desire him to accept many hearty thanks.

 The real name, with the address, of OISEAU, winner of one-quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,460, is C. Owen Griffiths, Esq., Trewern, Hay, Hereford.

 The real name, with the address, of NICHOLA, winner of one-quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,460, is Robert Nichols, Esq., c/o Mr. Curle, 7, Lindsay Road, Tatham Street, Sunderland.

 The real name, with the address, of LORNA, winner of TRUTH Prize No. 1,461, is J. H. Naylor, Esq., 45, Cleveland Road, Huddersfield.

 The real name, with the address, of VOX, winner of £1 1s., in connection with TRUTH Prize No. 1,462, is William Vokes, Esq., Alandale, Pinner Road, Harrow.

 The real name, with the address, of P.F.H., winner of 10s. 6d., in connection with TRUTH Prize No. 1,462, is Philip F. Holland, Esq., 6., Fair Street, Cambridge.

MISS KINNISON.—Will you kindly adopt another pseudonym, as "Ginger" is already appropriated.

OLDTRAF.—Very pleased to welcome you. I have duly registered your nom-de-plume.

SPONGE.—Many thanks for your letter. I am afraid, however, that it is at present rather too soon to have another serious poetry competition; though I cannot, of course, but agree with you that the Berlin disaster would make an excellent subject.

B.H.—The correspondence to which you refer must have been addressed to my predecessor, the late much lamented Puzzle Editor. In any case, I am afraid that the matter is too much out of date to be now reopened. It is impossible to find space for printing more than a fraction even of current Puzzle solutions. So incursion into ancient history is out of the question.

DERULA.—Many thanks for your amusing and friendly letter. As has already been announced in TRUTH, when the next Puzzle Story Competition is framed, the question which you raise will be taken into careful consideration. The "Valentine" solutions have not yet been judged; but I hope to be able to publish the award next week.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1578. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, March 27, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

ENTRE NOUS.

IT gives me much pleasure to publish the following letter that I have received from a lady who does not wish her name disclosed:—

Dear Truth,—I am not a rich woman, but I should be sorry to think that the poor children should lose their new sixpences next Christmas owing to the death of their so long unknown friend, Sir Francis Barry. I will gladly promise you four hundred new sixpences for this year, and if I can send more next year I will willingly do so. Perhaps if a few more people will do the same, there will be no sad little hearts next Christmas. Should you think of publishing my offer, others might follow. I will also gladly defray the expenses of distributing my small gift.—Yours truly,

Since the sad news came of the death of the unknown friend, I have naturally been considering the possibility of keeping up Sir Francis Barry's benefaction in connection with the Truth Toy Fund. I do not doubt the possibility of raising 11,000 sixpences for this purpose among the readers of Truth, and it seems a small matter to ask some thousands and tens of thousands of people to undertake among them what one man has done so long single-handed. But what I am compelled to consider is the possibility of raising such a fund without drawing away subscriptions from the Toy Fund. The danger of this would be small if the necessary number of sixpences could be made up or promised now, when the necessity of appealing for the Toy Fund is some months distant. I publish the above letter, therefore, in the hope that it will express a widespread feeling and evoke a practical response. I am not asking for contributions of sixpences now, but if any ladies or gentlemen will let me know at once that they are willing to contribute to this admirable object, I shall be able to judge whether or not there is a sufficient prospect of support to justify me in making a serious effort to keep up Sir Francis Barry's gift.

The King and Queen will leave Marseilles next week on their Mediterranean cruise, and they will probably pay a private visit to Gibraltar in the Royal yacht before going to Sicily and Naples. The King is expected to return to London on April 26 or 27, and it is expected that his Majesty will go to Newmarket on Tuesday, the 30th, for the First Spring Meeting, returning to town after the races on Friday, May 3. The King will come back to England overland from the Mediterranean, but the Queen will probably return by sea, landing at Portsmouth about Wednesday, May 1.

It is very likely that the King's visit to Ireland will after all take place during the last fortnight of May, as was originally proposed, instead of being postponed until later on in the year. In this case his Majesty will cross from Holyhead to Kingstown about Saturday, May 18, and he will proceed to the Viceregal Lodge, Dublin. During his stay in Ireland the King is to pay visits to Lord and Lady Londonderry at Mount Stewart, and to the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire at Lismore Castle, and he will return to England about Saturday, June 1, embarking on board the Royal yacht at Waterford.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to stay at Sandringham for about a fortnight, after which they will return to Marlborough House for the season, and they will then be in town until Whitsuntide, except during their five days' absence (April 22 till 26) in Scotland. The Prince and Princess are to spend the Whitsuntide holidays at Frogmore Lodge, and they will again reside there from June 15 till 24, when they will entertain a number of guests for Ascot races.

It has been settled that on each day of the Royal visits to Glasgow (April 23 and 24) the Prince and Princess of Wales are to travel by special train from Renfrew to St. Enoch Station. On Tuesday, the 23rd, the Royal party will return by the same route in the afternoon, but on Wednesday, the 24th, they will drive back to Blythswood House in motor-cars. On the morning of Thursday, the 25th, the Prince and Princess will sail down the Clyde in a special steamer from Renfrew Pier to Clydebank Dock, and they will return to Blythswood in time for luncheon.

A contemporary announces that after the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Lord and Lady Blythswood, at Blythswood House, next month, "they will go on to Floors Castle on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe." As a matter of fact, the Prince and Princess of Wales will travel back direct from Glasgow to London when they leave Blythswood on Friday, April 26, and their intended visit to Floors Castle will not take place until the autumn. The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe are now abroad, and they are not expected to return to Floors for several months.

Several of the papers are stating that either York Cottage is to be rebuilt on a larger scale, or the Prince of Wales is going to buy an estate in the Midland counties. Two or three rooms may be added to York Cottage during the summer, but that will be the extent of the work there. There is no idea of the Prince of Wales purchasing an estate, large or small, either in the Midland counties or anywhere else. Some years ago there was some talk of the Prince becoming the tenant of Houghton Hall, the celebrated seat of the Walpoles, which is within an easy drive of Sandringham, and which now belongs to Lord Cholmondeley, but the project was abandoned. If two or three rooms are added to York Cottage, that residence will afford all necessary accommodation for the Prince and Princess of Wales and their family and household.

The papers were last week printing what they described as "an interesting announcement concerning the Princes Edward and Albert of Wales," the news in question being the fact that they are going to the Royal Naval School at Osborne. This arrangement was notified in Truth about five months ago, when I was also enabled to state that the two Princes will afterwards proceed to the Britannia Naval College at Dartmouth, and later on they will be sent on a long voyage in a man-of-war. Truth also announced that Prince Edward is ultimately to enter the Army, while Prince Albert will join the Navy. These arrangements were settled by the King and the Prince and Princess of Wales at Balmoral last autumn. A morning paper states that Prince Edward enters the Army "by special desire of the King," which is nonsense. There has never been any other career contemplated for him, nor is any other possible for the ultimate heir to the Throne. It may be added that the Sovereign exercises absolute authority in all questions concerning the custody or education of members of the Royal family.

Prince Fushima of Japan, who is coming to England to return thanks to the King for the Order of the Garter which was last year conferred on the Mikado, will spend the next few weeks on the Continent, and he is expected to arrive in London early in May. Prince Fushima's visit is official, and he will be lodged at York House, St. James's Palace, during his stay in London. A State banquet is to be given by their Majesties in his honour at Buckingham Palace, and the first Court Ball will take place while he is in London. Prince Fushima is to make a tour through the country, during which he will probably visit Oxford and Cambridge, Edinburgh, the manufacturing districts, and some of the principal ports. The Prince is bringing valuable presents for the King and Queen, and the first Japanese decoration for his Majesty.

The visit of the King and Queen of Denmark to England will probably take place in June, and it is expected that their Majesties will be accompanied by their third son, Prince Harold, and by their third and only unmarried daughter, Princess Thyra. It is very likely that their Majesties will time their visit so as to be in England for the Ascot Meeting, in which case they will be the guests of the King and Queen at Windsor Castle during the race week. The King and Queen of Denmark are now expected to visit St. Petersburg in May. King Frederick will afterwards pay official visits to Vienna and to Paris, but he is not to be accompanied to those capitals by Queen Louise.

"OH, WILLIE, WE HAVE MISSED YOU."

All sorts of things have taken place,
Which you 'd have thought might well inspire
The Kaiser of the German Race
To send along his usual wire.

The Iéna has been blown to bits;
Lamsdorff and Berthelot expire;
All night our House of Commons sits—
And yet the Kaiser 's sent no wire.

We 've seen the Suevic on the shoals,
The Jebba wrecked by breakers dire;
We 've seen the County Council polls—
And yet the Kaiser 's sent no wire.

We 've seen the suffragettes absurd
To crowns of martyrdom aspire;
Eke Haldane's Army schemes we 've heard—
And yet the Kaiser 's sent no wire.

I fear there must be something wrong.
That 's why I 'm writing to inquire.
Oh, Willie, we have missed you long,
Oh, Willie, dear, why don't you wire?

Lord Mount Edgcumbe, who has been for many years a member of the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall, has accepted the office of Keeper of the Privy Seal of the Duchy, in the place of Lord Spencer. Lord Revelstoke has become a member of the Duchy Council, succeeding Lord Mount Edgcumbe. It has been announced that Lord Mount Edgcumbe's selection for "the most important office" connected with the Duchy is to be followed by important reforms in the management of the estates and other property. This is all a pure fiction. "The most important office" connected with the Duchy of Cornwall is held by Lord Ducie, who is Lord Warden of the Stannaries. There is no idea of carrying out any reforms, nor are changes called for, as the Duchy of Cornwall property has been most judiciously managed in all respects ever since Prince Albert took the affairs into his own hands directly after the birth of the present King.

The accounts of the Duchy of Cornwall for 1906 show that the total receipts were £140,015, of which £92,832 came from rents and profits of Courts, royalties produced £3,909, wood sales brought in £1,047, there were £11,672 from dividends on stock, and £16,216 from the Consolidated Fund, being compensation for the loss of the coinage duties, post groats, and white rents. The Prince of Wales was paid over £80,331. Improvements on the estates accounted for £16,000, and deductions under various Acts of Parliament ran away with £16,319. Expenses of management came to £9,269, of which £4,566 were paid to the Duchy establishment in London. The cost of management might surely be reduced considerably.

The Duchy of Lancaster accounts for 1906 show that the total income during last year was £103,147, out of which £63,000 was paid to the Keeper of the Privy Purse for his Majesty's use. Rents and profits of Courts yielded £58,981, and royalties and rents of mines and quarries produced £25,942.

Owing to Lady Aberdeen's continued illness, Lord and Lady Aberdeen were unable to leave Dublin Castle at the close of the "season," according to the usual Viceregal habit. They expect shortly to take up their residence at the Viceregal Lodge, where they will spend Eastertime. The following week will be the great Irish race meeting week, the national "Punchestown" races being fixed for Tuesday and Wednesday, and the Leopardstown meeting for Friday and Saturday. The week is at a somewhat earlier date than usual this year, which brings the probability that winter may yet be lingering "in the lap of spring" at the time. However, enthusiasm for festivals connected with the horse never fail, let the weather be what it may. Punchestown week has the pleasant tradition of good weather associated with it, a wet, or wild, "Punchestown" having seldom been known.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen will have visitors at the Viceregal Lodge for Punchestown week, and the usual entertaining will be done, if Lady Aberdeen's health continues to improve as it has been improving. Parties of visitors will also assemble in many houses in Kildare, Meath, and many other counties, which the motor has now brought within daily reach of Punchestown. The hotels in Dublin and the neighbourhood will be full as usual for the week.

Mr. Dames Longworth, of Glynwood, who died suddenly last week while walking in his grounds, was one of the most popular landowners in Ireland, and his death is most deeply regretted by people of all classes, both Roman Catholics and Protestants. He was a general favourite, and will be greatly missed. Mr. Dames Longworth owned large estates in King's County, Roscommon, Westmeath, and Galway.

Sir Victor Drummond, who died at Munich on Friday, was a son of the late Mr. Andrew Drummond, of Cadland Park, Hants, and a grandson of the fifth Duke of Rutland. He belonged to the Strathallan branch of the Drummond family. Sir Victor commenced his diplomatic career in 1852, when Lord Malmesbury appointed him attaché to the Embassy at Paris. He was employed successively at Madrid, Athens, St. Petersburg, Washington, and Vienna until 1890, when he became Minister to the Courts of Munich and Stuttgart. Sir Victor was a clever, shrewd man, pleasant in his manner, and very hospitable. He will be regretted by many friends in various parts of Europe.

Mr. Charles Bathurst, of Lydney Park, who died on Friday, owned a large estate in West Gloucestershire, and for many years he took an active part in county business. He was a generous benefactor to the town of Lydney, his gifts including a public park. The Elizabethan house at Lydney commands beautiful views over the Severn estuary, and it contains some excellent portraits. The park has many interesting Roman antiquities, and in the gardens there are some splendid Spanish chestnut and orange trees. The manor of Lydney, which belonged for centuries to the Beauchamps, Earls of Warwick, was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Admiral Wyntoun for his services against the Spanish Armada. The estate passed to the Bathursts about the middle of the eighteenth century.

There is a Scottish adage, "Peebles for pleasure," which in former years has been verified in the most satisfactory manner by many visitors to the well-known hotel-hydro conducted by Mr. Albert M. Thiem. It will interest them, and others likewise, to learn that the building which was destroyed by fire in July, 1905, has now been replaced by a more palatial and up-to-date establishment, which was opened last week. The new Hotel-Hydropathic has been built on the site of the old, standing in its own extensive grounds on a spot high on the north bank of the Tweed. It is situated in a most healthy as well as beautiful district, and, with a complete installation of modern medical baths, the establishment makes its appeal to those who are in need of cures as well as of rest and pleasure.

It seems that I may have erred last week in saying that Swiss law gives an hotel-keeper a right to an indemnity over and above any specific loss which he may have incurred in the event of an outbreak of infectious disease among his guests. A claim of such a nature, though occasionally made by the baser sort of proprietors of pensions, etc., is apparently mere bluff, and that it may be successfully resisted has since been shown in the case mentioned last week. The lady referred to put herself in the hands of a lawyer at Montreux, who settled the landlord's claim of over £40 by a payment of £4! The following statement of Swiss law, given to me by a correspondent thoroughly familiar with the country, may be of use to visitors to Switzerland who have unfortunate experiences of this kind:—

The Swiss law is clear and reliable, and the Courts will recognise no fictitious claim for loss of custom, departure of other visitors, etc.; nothing but damages for cost of disinfection, destruction of bedding, repapering of rooms, and such-like necessary expenditure.

The death "indemnité," or claim made upon the relatives of a person dying in a boarding-house or hotel is another form of callous and indefensible extortion, which is contrary to the law of the land. As in the case of infectious disease, actual loss from damage to hotel furniture or structure, and also compensation for closure of the room during a short period, are recoverable. But no claim for an "indemnité" pure and simple, tacked on to the costs incurred by disinfection and damage to property, is recognised by the Court. (Vide Mrs. Saint v. Franz—Civil Tribunal, Montreux, 1902.)

The following form, forwarded by a branch of the bank mentioned for a customer's signature, seems to show that business people occasionally expect those with whom they are dealing to be extremely unbusinesslike. Why should the receipt be forwarded before the documents have been received?

To the Manager,
National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, ———
I have received all the paid vouchers relating to my account for the half-year ending December 31, 1906.

Please sign and return, when vouchers will be sent.

In reference to the recent observations in TRUTH on the financial affairs of the Betterment of London Association, I have received letters from Sir Alfred Jacoby, M.P., and Sir Robert Hobart, M.P., both of which are to the same effect. Each gentleman states that he was quite unaware that his name was being used in connection with the Association, and that he has written to the secretary requesting the removal of his name from the list of Vice-Presidents and Members of the Council published last week. Sir Alfred adds that he has never been summoned to any council meeting, which is precisely what I should have supposed.

Of course, if people's names are used without their permission, they have no responsibility or duty in connection with anything that has been done. As regards some of the names, however, on Bowden Green's list, it is clear from the letters published last week that permission has been given for their use. Those gentlemen who have done this, whether with or without adequate knowledge of the character of the concern and its "honorary" secretary, are clearly under an obligation to those who have been induced to subscribe in the belief that reputable people were concerned in the management of the concern. It is to be hoped, therefore, that no gentlemen in this position will shirk their duty by retiring, but that they will use their position for the purpose of reducing Bowden Green to order, or removing him altogether from the management, and placing the financial affairs of the Association on a proper business-like footing.

Another example has just come under my notice of the practice of inducing people to invest money in small firms carried on as limited companies, as a condition of appointment as clerks or secretaries. The firm in this instance is called the "Where-to-Stay Bureau, Ltd.," and has an office in Baker-street. A Mr. J. F. Powell appears to be the head of it. It gets up books of illustrated advertisements of boarding-houses and hotels at the various watering-places, advertises in the newspapers, and sends its pamphlets to people who reply. Last summer a lady was induced to take shares to the amount of £100 in consideration of being appointed secretary at £2 a week, with a commission of 10 per cent. on the business done. After about three months she was so unfavourably impressed with the manner in which Mr. Powell was conducting the business that she gave up the appointment. Since then she has been endeavouring, but of course unsuccessfully, to obtain a repayment of her £100.

It appears that the Where-to-Stay Bureau, Ltd., only has a capital of £1,500, in the same number of shares, of which 1,200 in the first instance were taken by Mr. Powell, and, of course, the shares transferred to the lady in the above case were those of Powell himself. People in search of employment cannot be too strongly warned against taking shares in small unknown companies under such circumstances. I might add that the proprietors of private hotels and boarding-houses who are advertising in the publications of the Where-to-Stay Bureau would do well to satisfy themselves more closely than they appear to have done at present as to the return which they are getting for their expenditure.

The combination of investment with employment is of course perfectly legitimate. But there is always a certain amount of risk attaching to it when in the case of persons seeking employment, who are ready to invest a small sum in a business, but have themselves no business experience which would enable them to judge for themselves the real value of the business into which they are going to put their money. When a handsome remuneration is held out, the temptation to invest a few hundred pounds, more or less in the dark, is often irresistible. Retired Army officers, anxious for employment, and having some small capital at their disposal, are particularly liable to be caught in this way. Major F. E. V. Taylor, late of the Sherwood Foresters, has lately opened an Officers' Employment Bureau at Belfast Chambers, Beak-street, W., with a view to assisting officers under such circumstances. He undertakes to make inquiries for clients who desire to combine "employment with investment," and there is no doubt that such an agency, in competent and trustworthy hands, may be extremely useful.

I do not know what may be the cause of it, but my old friend, Manning Press, has lately been inspired to a most extraordinary outburst of activity. His operations at the expense of Lancashire Leaders, Derbyshire Leaders, and Cheshire Leaders have been recorded in TRUTH within the last few weeks, but since the end of February he seems to have started upon Lincolnshire Leaders, and then dashed off to the other end of the kingdom in search of Devonshire Leaders. The description of the "forthcoming exceptionally interesting and beautiful new County Illustrated Work" is precisely the same for all counties, as are the terms (3gs.) for promotion to the rank of a County Leader. As long as human nature is what it is, I suppose that Manning Press, or "Ernest Gaskell," as he now calls himself, will find nonentities willing to pay his price for this honour; but he would have much more difficulty in doing so if he were not assisted thereto by Lords Lieutenant and other genuine "Leaders." It is astonishing that he should be able to obtain such assistance, but he states—I suppose correctly—that he is supported in

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.—L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S., testifies as follows:—"I think it only right to state that for some years I have prescribed Dr. Alabone's remedies for chest diseases, having been converted to do so by the marvellous recovery of a patient whom I had given up to die. Since then I have attended other cases of advanced tubercular disease, and have watched them gradually restored to health."—"The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," price 2s. 6d., by E. W. Alabone, Lynton House, Highbury-quadrant, N.

Lincolnshire by Earl Brownlow, and in Devonshire by Earl Fortescue.

As usual, success induces competition, and those counties which have not yet been attacked by Ernest Gaskell may expect the attentions of other literary free-booters of the same type. A gentleman calling himself Allan North sends out a circular from Baxter Lodge, Clissold Park, N., announcing that the preparation of his new work on Kent is nearing completion, and that his engravers are anxiously waiting for the favour of the loan of your photograph. Like Press, alias Gaskell, Mr. North is happy to say that his undertaking "is receiving the heartiest support from very influential county families." One of the men of Kent whose patronage and photograph have been applied for suggests that this is only Manning Press under a new name, but the identity of the operator is not of much consequence.

It may be hoped that nothing more will be heard of the scheme for building a residence at Oxford inside the Parks for the Professor of Astronomy. This project has been "simmering" for several years past, and it has now been most decisively rejected by Congregation, being lost by the majority of 156 to 55. The Parks are an open space of the greatest value, and on no consideration should they be reduced in area by building operations. Let but one house be erected, and very soon others would be projected. It is difficult to understand why the successive Professors of Astronomy have not arranged to make more use of the Radcliffe Observatory, which might surely work usefully in conjunction with the observatory in the Parks. It is absurd that there should be two excellent observatories at Oxford within a short distance of each other, unless they are to work together and in perfect harmony.

POOR LITTLE BEAST!

(By a Protestant Lady.)

I love thee! I love thee! How dare Vaughan chide, O,
My love for my popsety-wopsety Fido?
Thou art bound to my heart by a thousand ties—
By thy snuffling nose, by thine oozy eyes,
By thy mangy coat and thy neck's skin creased—
And yet he has called thee "a little beast."

I love thee! I love thee! With joy elate
I dote on thy dear little waddling gait,
And fonder thy smelly head I kiss.
Than ever did lover the lips of miss.
And yet that rude and unfeeling priest
Has dared to call thee "a little beast."

* * * *

Slate me, O Father, as much as you like,
At my sins and vices and foibles strike,
Lash my excesses, my Bridge attack,
And paint my morals in Brunswick black,
But treat as a sacred thing, at least,
The hallowed name of my "little beast."

Two important appointments have just been made by Bishop Wordsworth in the diocese of Salisbury. He has presented the Rev. Eric J. Bodington, who has been Vicar of Potterne, near Devizes, for the last eight years, to the living of Calne, which has become vacant by the much regretted death of Canon Duncan, who had held this benefice since 1865, when he was presented by Bishop Hamilton. Calne is worth nearly seven hundred a year, with house. The Bishop has presented Prebendary Whitefoord, who has been Principal of the Salisbury Theological College since 1884, to the living of Potterne, which is worth between four and five hundred a year, with residence. Canon Duncan was an intimate friend of Lord Lansdowne, and for many years he had been domestic chaplain at Bowood.

The Church Patronage Trustees have presented the Rev. H. E. Noyes, Chaplain of the Anglican Church in the Rue d'Aguesseau, Paris, to the important living of St. Mary's, Kilburn, which is of the net value of about £800 a year with house, and which has become vacant by the preferment of the Rev. W. H. Stone to the rectory of Walcot, Bath, on the presentation of the Simeon Trustees.

The death of the Rev. A. H. Williams is much regretted in South Warwickshire. He was one of the most popular and most highly esteemed parish clergymen in the county. Mr. Williams, who had held the rectory of Alcester for thirty-eight years, was a chaplain to the King, and he filled the same office under Queen Victoria for nearly a quarter of a century. He was a brother of Canon Williams, of Hereford. The living of Alcester is in the gift of Lord Hertford.

Chancellor Newbolt is to be the Canon-in-residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during April, replacing Archdeacon Sinclair. The Bishop of London is to preach for the Dean at the morning service next Sunday.

The impossibility of extinguishing a chain-letter when it has once got a fair hold on the public is shown once again by an advertisement issued by Dr. Barnardo's Homes, which will be found on another page. In this a further attempt is made to stop the circulation of the famous appeal started by Miss Robertson, of Kenilworth. I suppose that this "snowball" has been rolling over the United Kingdom and the Colonies for five or six years past, if not longer. Long before his death Dr. Barnardo endeavoured to stop it, but in vain. The letter, which was originally started, as such things often are, without any attempt to obtain the sanction of the charity for whose benefit it was intended, has now become altered into a shape which the present managers of the homes describe as "highly misleading," and is "actually doing harm to the Homes." It is deplorable that an admirable charity should be injured in this way by the folly of people who suppose themselves to be helping it, and the public should understand that contributions should in all cases be sent to the head-quarters of the charity they desire to help, and not be given to unauthorised volunteer collectors.

A very ingenious, but, as I believe, an impotent attempt to evade the Lottery Act has been devised by the promoters of a bazaar in aid of the Christian Brothers Schools at Bristol. It has been the practice of the Christian Brothers to raise the wind in Ireland by means of huge gambles, and last year I was compelled to criticise the brethren somewhat severely on account of their circulation of an impudently garbled extract from TRUTH in reference to a so-called "grand Art Union drawing" at Clonmel. Beyond the use of some euphemism of this kind, lotteries—at any rate, ecclesiastical lotteries—are carried on without any disguise in Ireland, the law against them in that country being in abeyance. The Christian Brothers now seem to think that the ecclesiastical lottery can be introduced in England, though their scheme recognises the need for the exercise of some circumspection—not to say trickery.

The Christian Brothers Bazaar at Bristol is to be held under the patronage of the Bishop of Clifton on December 30 and 31. The committee have lately been inviting advertising agents to take spaces on the backs of "the tickets for same" of which "a minimum of 2,000,000 copies will be circulated per post through the English-speaking world." Specimens of the tickets are submitted to the agents; and it is palpable that they are nothing but lottery tickets, though they have been artfully framed to get round the law. The front of the ticket is mainly occupied with an imposing list of articles, ranging from a Kimberley diamond (or value £100), a motor bicycle, a pony and trap, or a fat bullock, to a railway waggon of coal, a chest of tea, or a sewing machine. Each ticket has a duplicate to be returned with the purchase money to the Rev. Bro. J. F. Roche, The Christian Brothers, Berkeley-square, Bristol. The price of the ticket is sixpence, described "as a contribution to the fund," and "the names of the persons to whom the committee will present the above articles" will, it is notified, be published in various newspapers. On the back of the ticket is the following:—

Bazaar Receipt Form.

1.—The Committee, whose names are herein set forth, or a majority thereof, shall have the entire power of deciding in any way they think fit to whom (if any person) they may present the articles.

2.—The amount paid for the ticket for which this is a receipt is accepted by the Committee on these terms as a contribution by the purchaser of the ticket towards the cost of the articles (which have been purchased for the benefit of the Bazaar) and the expenses of the Bazaar.

So proud are the Christian Brothers of this little scheme that they print on the tickets the warning: "Copyright registered: Infringers will be proceeded against." It seems to me that the parties most likely to be proceeded against are those who engage in the distribution and sale of these tickets. Notwithstanding the careful avoidance of any reference to a "lottery," or a "drawing," or a "raffle," or even "prizes," and the above-quoted statement as to the power of the committee to "present the articles" in any way they think fit, I think it will be found that this scheme is a lottery within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. There are certainly decisions which bear out that view, and obviously if such a dodge as this could succeed the law might as well be repealed. I hope, therefore, that the Chief Constable of Bristol will at once take advice on the matter, and, if necessary, warn the Christian Brothers of the penalties they will be incurring if they proceed with this project. I fear from former experiences that it would be useless to appeal to them to drop it on the ground of the discredit which they bring upon the Roman Catholic Church by this system of gambling.

In the debate on the future of the Militia, which Lord Wemyss started in the House of Lords last Thursday, there was a curious conflict of opinion on one point between the Duke of Bedford and Lord Hardinge, though they were both "agin' the Government." One of the grounds on which the Duke most strongly condemned the suppression of the Militia was that that force had lately supplied the Army with more than half its infantry recruits. On the other hand, Lord Hardinge was of opinion that the system of recruiting the line through the Militia is "pernicious and dishonest, and should be abolished." He insisted that "no man should be allowed to transfer from the Militia to the Line without the consent of his commanding officer." When one champion of the Militia finds one of its chief merits in a feature which the next champion would abolish at once as a pernicious abuse, it is not surprising that the Secretary of State and his advisers have been unable to carry out the ideas of Militia C.O's.

When Mr. Haldane introduced his scheme he mentioned a most important fact of which sufficient notice has not been taken, though it must be news to a very large number of people. He stated that 80 per cent. of the Volunteers at present are of the artisan class. This fact has a most important bearing upon the Territorial Army scheme, and it discounts a great deal of the merely speculative criticism which the scheme has incurred. The Duke of Bedford, for instance, spoke very confidently of the impossibility of recruiting the new force from the same class of men who have hitherto furnished the Militia. "The Militia," he said, "is recruited from among the working and labouring classes," and he went on to demonstrate the impossibility of obtaining such men for a force "conducted on Volunteer lines." Evidently his Grace missed that important point in Mr. Haldane's statement, for it disposes entirely of his prophecy. The thing which cannot be done is done already.

One of the most eminent of our instructors in military matters, writing to me privately a few weeks ago, observed that "while you and I and every one else has been asleep, the Volunteers have transformed themselves into a Militia." He referred chiefly to the substantial payments now received by all ranks of Volunteers in many battalions for camp training. When Mr. Haldane's 80 per cent. of working men are added to the argument, it seems to become pretty conclusive. A great many reasons have been advanced for the decay of the Militia, but when one looks at the real facts, the truth of the matter seems to be that the Militia has of late been "bled white" by the Volunteers. Presumably this view of the matter has been taken by Mr. Haldane and the Army Council; and if it is the sound view, the policy of making Volunteers rather than Militia the basis of the Territorial Force is likely to be justified by the results. At any rate, the facts warrant the view that there is a far better chance of obtaining the required force on a Volunteer than on a Militia basis.

Though not always agreeing with the Daily Mail, I have a great admiration for its vivacity and originality; and its latest idea of publishing ironical leading articles by way of ridiculing the humbug of these compositions is very amusing. The all-night sitting of Parliament last week gave the D. M. humorist an excellent opportunity. As everybody knows, the business with which honourable legislators diverted themselves on that occasion included the Army (Annual) Bill, which has been passed more or less in the same form for many generations past. By way of parodying the absurd ignorance and pomposity of leader-writers, the Daily Mail pretended to think next day that the House had been trifling with Mr. Haldane's Army scheme. "It is a great misfortune," the writer began, "that Mr. Haldane's Bill for Army Reform should, even in outward appearance, have been associated with the untoward events in the House of Commons during the all-night sitting." And then followed a solemn disquisition on the merits of Mr. Haldane's scheme and the necessity for patriotic concentration in order to give it a chance. In this amusing way the writer affected to repair the "untoward events" in Parliament, and mitigate the "great misfortune" that had befallen the State.

The only objection to this form of humour is the danger of its being taken seriously. Among the 900 billions, or thereabouts—I am only quoting the figures from memory—of Daily Mail readers, there must necessarily be a certain percentage of ignorant people, people who cannot see jokes, and people accustomed to receive as gospel all the utterances of editors. It is alarming to think of the effect which this new kind of journalistic fooling may have upon them. At the best they must be bewildered, at the worst they may fall a prey to quite insane delusions about contemporary events.

Immediately after the article about the great misfortune that had befallen Mr. Haldane's army scheme, the Mail had another for the benefit of "the hapless income-tax payer." This omnipresent sufferer was told that "he is threatened with a fresh measure of spoliation to provide the Government's supporters with old age pensions." Only a few days previously, however, the City editor of the Mail, who has not previously been known as a humorist, had encouraged the world to suppose that the Government's supporters were to be provided with old age pensions by some financial legerdemain based on a loan of twenty millions—in other words, by the spoliation of holders of Consols, which were thereby to be driven down to zero. The reader who happens to be both an income-tax payer and a holder of Consols may have the gumption to see that either the City editor or the leader writer is "getting at" him, and may perhaps suspect that both are. But those of the 900 billions who are not given to clear thinking will understand nothing, except that old age pensions involve general "spoliation," which, of course, is quite the last thing that the airy wags of the Daily Mail intended to convey.

The following observations were not written for publication, but form part of a private communication from a personal friend. But the interests of the State come before those of private friendship, and I think it is a public duty to warn the Government of the trouble that may come upon them if they persist in making my friend carry his rifle. As he is not by nature of a discontented spirit, I have no doubt that others are resenting this burden besides him:—

> I regret to say that I shall have to turn Conservative again, or else start a party of my own, at the next general election. The reason is that I see no amelioration of the miserable condition of the poor fool who calls himself an officer, but who, after 22 years' zealous service, is condemned to carry a rifle when he marches out with his company, like the last arrival from the depot.

I have had sundry communications from the Army Veterinary Service in reference to the question raised by an article in the Veterinary News upon a memorandum of the Indian Adjutant-General, which called attention to the facilities offered for the instruction of cavalry officers in veterinary hospitals. The matter was discussed in Truth some two months ago. I have waited to hear from India before saying anything more upon it. The following letter from a veterinary officer in that country seems to state most concisely the professional objection to the memorandum in question:—

> You do not seem to be aware of the existence of veterinary schools in the Army. There are two in India, one at Poona and one at Umballa. Here veterinary courses of three months are held once or twice a year for the special training of officers, N.C.O.'s, and men, farriers and shoeing-smiths, in veterinary first aid, stable management, saddles and sore backs, shoeing, etc. Numbers of officers, etc., attend these schools yearly, but it would appear that officers of British cavalry do not avail themselves of them as they should do, as two years ago only two out of a very large number were British cavalry officers.
> We are all agreed that a certain amount of elementary veterinary knowledge, comprised under the term "veterinary first aid," simple sanitation or hygiene, and horsemanship, is necessary for cavalry officers; but these subjects should be taught in the proper place, namely, the veterinary schools. The great objection to the order in question, and one which has not been made clear to you, is that the veterinary hospitals, as distinct from the veterinary schools, are now besieged on certain days during the hours that veterinary officers are in attendance by classes which interfere with their professional work. This is quite a different matter from holding classes in a class-room and giving a simple lecture on "first aid," sanitation, etc., by veterinary officers. What would medical officers say if their hospitals and wards were invaded by parties of officers, N.C.O.'s, and men enlightening themselves on the treatment of disease at the bedsides of the patients? This is practically what we are asked to endure. The thing is absurd and should be discontinued.

Thus stated, the grievance is perfectly intelligible and deserving of consideration. If it was not properly appreciated in the previous reference to the matter in Truth the fault lies with the writer in the Veterinary News, not me. The purport of the V.N. article was clearly indicated by its title, "Every Man to his Trade," and it lost sight of the particular point about the practical inconvenience of teaching elementary veterinary science in hospitals rather than schools, in a general argument tending to deprecate the intrusion of the laity into the sacred mysteries of professional knowledge. Against such nonsense I protested in the name of common sense, but I am sorry to say this has not prevented sundry Brahmins of the veterinary mysteries writing long letters to convince me of my errors.

To draw the proper line of demarcation between professional and lay knowledge of technical or scientific matters is not easy, though the difficulty arises more in theory than in practice. I am not going to attempt it, but one of my veterinary correspondents delivered a challenge which seems to require an answer. He was much perturbed at finding remarks in Truth to the effect that any farmer, coachman, etc., "who knows his business," is capable of doctoring his own animals, "thereby implying that veterinary science is little more than stable routine, and the everyday management of horses, cattle, and dogs." After reminding me of the number and complexity of the diseases and injuries of animals, and the severity of the study required for a diploma of the R.C.V.S., he proceeded to say:—

> Unless you maintain that every man who "knows his business" and possesses a general knowledge of mankind should be capable of "doctoring" both himself and his fellow-creatures, and that the occasions when it is necessary to call in a medical man are extremely rare, what reasonable grounds are there for supposing that he is competent to doctor animals?

This is a fallacious statement of the point. It is a farmer's or coachman's business to attend to the health of his animals, and that is the reason why, if he "knows his business," he will know how to doctor them in ordinary ailments. Only in exceptional cases is it a man's business to attend to the health of other human beings, and, therefore, "knowing his business" has not, as a rule, any reference to knowing how to doctor them. But when the cases are similar, the argument in the case of animals extends to human beings. For example, a good mother should understand the doctoring of her children in ordinary ailments just as a good farmer or coachman should understand the doctoring of his cattle or horses. A schoolmaster or schoolmistress should look after his or her children in the same way, either personally or by deputy—when I was at school the ordinary doctoring was done by the matron. Captains in the merchant service used to, if they do not now, perform the same office for their crews when occasion arose.

Moreover, every man of sense and education is able to perform the same office for himself, and generally has all the requisite appliances at hand when he feels out of order. The cases where lay knowledge is applied—and quite properly—must thus occur by thousands every day, and I readily accept the proposition that "the cases where it is necessary to call in a medical man are extremely rare." I do not blame a medical man for thinking otherwise or doing his best to inculcate the importance of sending for the doctor the moment the tongue looks a little unhealthy or the pulse beats one more to the minute than it ought to. But I blame the man who believes him.

It is high time that official attention was given to the complaints that have more than once been made publicly about the management of the public abattoir at Alexandria, where meat is killed for the whole of the British garrison in Egypt. A question was asked on the subject in Parliament towards the end of last session, and a promise was given that inquiries should be made, but no other result has followed. The principal matter for condemnation is the barbarous practice of killing animals by cutting their throats and leaving them to bleed slowly to death. Possibly it is followed in deference to Mohammedan traditions on this subject, but that argument does not amount to much, seeing that we are in Egypt for the purpose of enlightening the Egyptians with Western ideas. Besides, even if the animals must be bled for the benefit of the Mohammedan consumer, there is no reason why they should not be stunned first. A Service correspondent, who writes very strongly on this subject contends that this abattoir ought to be under the supervision of a properly qualified A.S.C. officer, which sounds reasonable. At present the place seems to be de facto under the management of a corporal.

In Truth of January 16 an account was given of the case of a former sergeant of the Army Service Corps named Pitt, who was reduced to the ranks and ordered to repay a sum of £33 odd, on conviction by a court-martial at Cape Town of negligence in the capacity of caterer in the garrison sergeants' mess, whereby the mess had incurred a loss of that amount on the beer account. One of the contentions for the defence at the court-martial was that the prisoner's duty as a clerk in the office of the Staff Captain, Naval Base, occupied so much of his time that he could not attend properly to the business of the mess. The man himself said that he was on duty in the office daily from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., but the Staff Captain asserted that his office work would not take him four hours a day. Mr. Haldane, when replying to a question by Lord Turnour on the case, referred to this evidence as a reason for not interfering with the decision.

I have since heard from Cape Town that two clerks A.S.C., a sergeant and a corporal, have since been put on duty at this office. It is therefore now found necessary to employ two men on work which, according to the evidence of the Staff Captain at Pitt's court-martial, would only occupy one man half a day. Unless it can be shown that the work has been multiplied by four in the meantime, which is not conceivable, that evidence must have been wholly erroneous. This is not the strongest point in the case. The main ground of defence was that there was no satisfactory evidence that the alleged loss had ever been incurred at all. But had the money really been lost, it became a material point that the caterer was not relieved of other duties, as required by para. 994, King's Regulations. The officers responsible for this breach of regulations were obviously interested in minimising it. The allegation that the prisoner's office work only took him four hours a day, in contradiction of his own statement that he was at work nine hours, ought therefore to have been regarded with suspicion; and the subsequent admission that there is work for two men in the office shows that this suspicion would have been well founded. The opinion that a gross injustice was done to this man is thus strongly confirmed, and it is a scandal that after this he should remain deprived of his rank and mulcted of £33, the loss of which has never been proved, and which the Court acquitted him of having embezzled.

Admiral Palliser, who died last week very suddenly, was a very popular officer and a keen sportsman. He was an able man, and his opinions on professional subjects were much valued. Admiral Palliser was on active service for forty-seven years. He served during the Crimean War both in the Baltic and in the Black Sea, and as a midshipman he distinguished himself on several occasions. During the Carlist War he was employed on the coast of Spain, and was officially thanked for his valuable services in protecting British interests. He afterwards commanded several vessels on foreign stations, and for two years he was employed at Hong Kong. He was Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific from 1896 until 1899, and was retired from the Navy under the age clause when he returned to England.

In consequence of the appearance of a paragraph in the Indian press, the following letter was recently addressed to a Maharajah whose name I need not mention. His Highness very prudently ignored the suggestion that it contained, and the letter has been passed on to me, with an inquiry as to whether I know anything of the writer or of the wonder-working Carroll:—

26, Mott-lane, Calcutta.

The Maharaja of ——.

Dear Maharaja,—I have lately read in the papers the news of the illness of. . . . I am the Editor of the News of India, and therefore write to tell you that I know of a gentleman who I believe could cure any of them, no matter what their disease, if you invite him.

While I was in Simla last season I saw many astonishing cures performed by this gentleman, Mr. W. F. Carroll, and since I have been in Calcutta I have seen still more marvellous cures effected by him, of every kind of disease known, sometimes in a single touch, but others after a longer treatment.

I am perfectly convinced that if you invite Mr. Carroll to —— he would cure, not only the ladies of your family, but any one who may be sick and suffering. This is my only excuse for venturing to trouble you with this letter.—Yours faithfully,

H. Baldwin May.

Though I think that I may fairly claim to have an extensive and peculiar acquaintance with quacks, this is the first time that I have come across W. F. Carroll. The sort of quack that he is may be judged from the fact that he advertises himself as a "natural magnetic healer," who "cures all diseases without medicine; distance no obstacle to treatment by means of magnetised articles." As to the News of India and its editor, I have never before heard of either; but I observe that the address from which the above letter is dated is also the address that Carroll gives in his advertisements. I should not, therefore, be surprised to learn that this apparently disinterested editor who so benevolently proffers his advice to illustrious invalids, is really the quack's paid trumpeter, and the News of India the instrument on which he performs.

The disgusting state of affairs existing in the lodging-houses at Tredegar, upon which I commented on February 27, has resulted in proceedings before the magistrates, a number of persons being summoned for breach of the by-laws. It was admitted by the sanitary inspector under cross-examination in the course of the hearing, that the authorities had been "blinking at breaches of the by-laws" until the condition of affairs had grown into a public scandal, and the magistrates expressed the hope that the Local Government Board would take action in the matter. I sincerely re-echo the hope, and I also hope that the action of the Bedwellty Guardians in boarding out their vagrants in these Tredegar dens will not escape attention.

Some account was given in these columns two or three weeks ago of the first stage of the public examination of Aaron Bagel, of Commercial-road, E., which seemed to exemplify very forcibly the evils described in my recent article, "The Alien in Bankruptcy." This impression is deepened by the last stage of the debtor's examination, which was brought to a conclusion last week. Aaron then explained blandly that he could not read or write, and did not understand book-keeping, and, as it was consequently impossible to get from him anything but explanations from memory of transactions dating back several years, the Official Receiver was naturally unable to throw much light upon the mysteries of the financial operations leading up to the bankruptcy. The principal facts elicited were that in the three months prior to the bankruptcy Aaron had bought stock to the value of £6,000, and had made a loss during that period of £700; and that having made losses to the amount of £1,926 between January, 1905, and October, 1906, he was drawing during that time for himself about £600 or £700 a year and paying his two sons, mere boys, £7 a week between them. Aaron is, indeed, more fortunate than Moses, who was not privileged to enter a land flowing with milk and honey.

Tradesmen and other persons against whom County Court judgments are registered are favoured with a circular from J. A. Palmer and Co., "C.A.," Newhall-street, Birmingham, who offer their services in "protecting your estate from executioners, and putting an end to your worry and trouble." In December, 1904, a King's Lynn grocer accepted this kindly offer, and, with the assent of his creditors, executed a deed of assignment to Palmer as trustee for the payment in instalments of a composition of 12s. 6d. in the £. The creditors have had much difficulty in getting any dividends from Palmer, and he has been very much in arrear in rendering accounts to the Board of Trade. In these circumstances an application was recently made to the County Court Judge at Birmingham to remove him from the trusteeship. Palmer admitted that for over twelve months he had had in hand a sum of £108 belonging to the estate. He also stated that the letters "C.A." affixed to his name did not mean—as people might infer—"chartered accountant," but "corporate accountant of Scotland." The Judge made the desired order, and, having regard to the revelation of his methods of business in this case, I should think debtors and their creditors would be well advised not to entrust the winding up of estates to Mr. J. A. Palmer.

There was a disagreeable appearance of vindictiveness about a prosecution of a motorist which came before the Barnsley West Riding Bench the other day after being held over for several months pending the result of a civil action. The action arose out of a collision between a motor-car and a wagonette, which at the trial in the County Court was shown to have been an accident due to an error of judgment—not to furious or reckless driving—on the part of the motorist. The latter was on his right side of the road, but turned off as the best means of avoiding the wagonette, which had been coming along on the wrong side. The driver of the wagonette, however, crossed to his proper side at the same moment, and in the resulting collision one of the horses was killed, while the motor-car was smashed up and the owner injured. Being found to have been in fault, inasmuch as he should, of course, have kept to his own side of the road, the motorist was mulcted in £50 damages and costs. This ought surely to have been considered a sufficient penalty. It failed, however, to appease the police and the magistrates, and on the top of the judgment against him in the County Court the motorist has now been fined £5 and costs and his licence has been endorsed. Even if it be conceded that a conviction under the Motor Car Act was justifiable, notwithstanding the civil action, a nominal fine would obviously have met the case.

A sitting of the Welshpool Borough Bench was held last week in the office of the magistrates' clerk, which is registered as an occasional court-room. Every sitting of the magistrates for the hearing of cases, wherever it takes place, must, of course, be open to the public, and on this occasion the reporters of the local papers were present. Mr. D. Pryce Owen, the senior magistrate, objected to their presence, and though the clerk pointed out that it was a public court, he refused to act unless the reporters withdrew, adding: "It is not a public court if we choose not to make it." The reporters stuck to their seats and Mr. Owen eventually quitted the room, leaving the business to be dealt with by other magistrates. Judging from the amazing ignorance which he exhibited in this matter, I should imagine that it would be a distinct gain to the administration of justice in Welshpool if this egregious J.P. permanently absented himself from the Bench.

The Mayor and other city fathers who adorn the Bench of Neath Borough Police-court have evolved a new method of dealing with offenders which has a strong Gilbertian flavour. One day last week several persons were brought before their Worships charged with using obscene language. The first was let off with a fine of 5s. and costs; the second was ordered to pay 10s. and costs; the third was fined 15s. and costs, or twenty-one days' imprisonment. When a fourth offender made his appearance the Mayor's indignation boiled over; he declared that this sort of thing must be put a stop to and fined him 20s. and costs, or a month. Why the Mayor of Neath should quadruple the punishment for an offence merely because the offender has the misfortune to be fourth on the list is explicable only on the grounds that he allowed his indignation to over-ride his judgment. I should like to point out to his Worship that such an exhibition is calculated to bring the administration of justice in the court over which he presides into contempt.

I wish Mr. John Burns would hurry along the promised amendment of the Vaccination Act which will entitle a conscientious objector to a certificate of exemption on his making a statutory declaration. It would save me the trouble of having to expose the perversity and stupidity of such Shallows as Messrs. H. A. Dunstan and L. Fox-Pitt, of the Shaftesbury Bench. In a case before these gentry last week an applicant stated that he conscientiously believed that vaccination would be detrimental to the health of his child. On this statement a certificate ought to have been granted, but the Bench proceeded to subject the applicant to a long cross-examination, which was at once irrelevant and—as the Lord Chief Justice and the Home Secretary have repeatedly pointed out—unwarrantable. Its object was to draw from the applicant an admission that he had a general objection to vaccination, whereupon the egregious Mr. Dunstan exclaimed, "if that is so it disqualifies you," and the certificate was refused.

Of course, a general objection to vaccination is not in itself a sufficient claim to a certificate. But, equally of course—though these magistrates are evidently too muddy-minded to perceive the point—a general objection to vaccination does not in any way debar a man from the relief afforded by the Act, if he also conscientiously believes—as this man affirmed he did—that vaccination will be prejudicial to the health of the particular child for whom the exemption is required. I have a general objection to the administration of the law by untrained, amateur magistrates. This does not, however, disqualify me from holding that in particular instances the magistrates are not merely untrained amateurs, but positive noodles.

What the Chester Chronicle calls an "amusing dialogue" took place the other day before the Chester magistrates at the hearing of a number of passive resistance summonses in respect of poor rate due. The dialogue was between one of the passive resisters and the magistrates' clerk, and the "amusing" part of it was a remark of this functionary in reply to the defendant, who contended that it had been admitted that the rate was an injustice. The clerk denied that it had been admitted by anybody, adding in a stage aside, "outside of Bedlam." This worthy clerk evidently needs a lesson in manners as well as a reminder that he is merely a servant of the magistrates, and that it is no part of his duty to ventilate his opinions with regard to cases brought before the bench.

I am pleased to see that the St. Helens police have successfully prosecuted a couple of practitioners of the Railway Clearance Sale trick, against which I have for years continuously warned my readers. The two men, as usual, offered samples of goods at ridiculously low prices, and after booking orders for these, palmed off pieces of shoddy cloth at treble the value. The police prosecuted upon a charge of obtaining money upon false pretences, and the magistrates convicted, sentencing the men to four months' hard labour each. The attention of police and magistrates generally may be usefully directed to this result, for the country is infested by similar gangs of swindlers who need dispersing.

The strained quality of the justice administered by Scottish bailies and sheriffs has long been a notable feature in my Legal Pillory, and this week I give a number of instances of their obliquity of vision in dealing with offences against property and offences against the person. The most remarkable contrast is afforded by the comparison of the punishment awarded a brutal wife-beater with that meted out to a dairy-keeper who had the temerity to sell a dozen eggs in defiance of a city by-law which demands the closing of his shop at 8 p.m. The wife-beater is merely mulcted in a couple of guineas for his amusement, while the struggling little tradesman, for his anxiety to add a few pence to his daily takings and at the same time oblige a customer, is fined £2 4s. 6d.—a truly remarkable example of disparity in fitting the punishment to the crime in the respective cases. In regard to the cases at Heanor and Retford, I regret that the reports which came under my notice did not contain the names of the adjudicating magistrates, for they appear to be well qualified for inclusion in my Pillory.

St. Rollox Police-court. Before Bailie Shaw-Maxwell. John Crawford, charged with assaulting his wife. He struck her several blows in the face. Fined £2 2s.

St. Rollox Police-court. Before Bailie Montgomery. E. Flannigan, charged with assaulting two women. He blacked both the eyes of one woman and kicked the other. Fined £2 2s.

Dunfermline Sheriff Court. Before Hon. Sheriff-Substitute Walker. Michael Glen, for striking his wife on the face and kicking her, fined £1. James Thomson, for kicking his wife and throwing a bowl at her, cutting her face, fined £1.

Heanor Petty Sessions. Samuel Marshall, charged with unlawfully assaulting a girl of thirteen. Fined 10s. and costs.

Coventry City Police-court. Before Messrs. Bill, Wyley, Pugh and Burbidge. John Moore, charged with assaulting his wife, who was living apart from him on a separation order. He had acted similarly on several previous occasions. Fined 5s. and costs, and bound over to keep the peace.

Blackburn Police-court. John Byrne, charged with assaulting his wife. He bashed her on the floor, danced on her stomach and struck her in the mouth, loosening her teeth. Fined 20s. and costs.

Stratford Police-court. Thomas Forbes and Sarah Stuart, charged with neglecting Forbes's four children. The children were cruelly beaten, placed in a back garden scantily clad, and kept without food. Fined £5 and costs each, or a months' hard labour.

Somerton Petty Sessions. Before Col. Pinney, Messrs. Valentine, Dickenson, Staley, Alford and Price. Samuel Rossiter, farmer, charged with cruelty to a horse. There were several raw wounds under the saddle and collar. Fined 20s.

Glasgow Police-court. Mitchelina Allan, dairykeeper, charged with a contravention of the early closing order by selling a dozen eggs after 8 p.m. Fined £2 4s. 6d. inclusive.

Glasgow Western Police-court. Before Bailie Dunlop. Robert M'Dowall, charged with stealing 9lb. of lead on one occasion and 19lb. on another. Thirty days' imprisonment.

Dunfermline Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Shennan. Peter Philp, convicted of trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined £2 16s. 9d. inclusive.

Perth Sheriff Court. E. Irvine, for gaffing a salmon on September 14 last, fined £3.

Retford Petty Sessions. George Ostick, aged 16, convicted of stealing a metal tea-pot and hammer value 3s. Fourteen days' imprisonment.

Coventry City Police-court. Before the same magistrates. James Flinn, rag gatherer, charged with sleeping in an outhouse without visible means of subsistence. He pleaded that he had been out of town, and on his return his lodgings were shut up. Twenty-eight days' hard labour.

Thrapston Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Buckley, G. Smith, Jellis, E. Smith and Adams. C. Newman, charged with breaking a plate-glass window, value £2 10s. One month's hard labour.

Romford Petty Sessions. Before Col. H. Holmes, Capt. H. J. Stone, and Messrs. Hope and Smith. Albert Rose, charged with erecting a Punch and Judy show on the Market Plain, Romford. Fined 40s. and 4s. costs, or fourteen days' imprisonment.

Chichester County Petty Sessions. Before the Rev. Chancellor H. M. Davey. John Wetherall, charged with acting as a pedlar without a licence. He was selling brushes and pleaded ignorance. Ten days' imprisonment.

Swainsthorpe Petty Sessions. Before Lord Lindley and Messrs. Denny and Steward. W. Knott, carrier, charged with cruelty to a mare. There were sores upon the back, shoulders, and under the tail, and the animal was attached to a heavily laden wagon. Fined £1 and costs.

Ipswich Police-court. Before Messrs. Alexander, Anness, Fraser, Sizer and Gibb. E. W. Trickner, charged with absconding from the workhouse. He pleaded that as seven days' notice was required he took French leave, having only had a night's lodging. One month's hard labour.

Rarely, in my humble judgment, do magistrates err seriously in the direction of undue leniency. Mr. Marsham, however, seems to have fallen into such an error in the case of Joseph Riley, who was brought up at Bow-street on a charge of stealing an overcoat from a shop. There seems to have been some evidence that the coat was taken from the shop by another man, who had handed it to the prisoner; but the latter had nothing better to say for himself than that he had been drinking after an attack of pneumonia, and "hardly knew what he was about." However, on the assumption that "the prisoner had been a mere catspaw of the man who had escaped," Mr. Marsham dismissed him on his own recognisances. Now, Riley had previously to this been convicted four times since 1898, and if ever there was a case where the "previous conviction" doctrine could be applied justifiably, it is his. The only reason for treating him so mercifully, as far as I can see, is that he is respectably connected, and came into a large fortune some years ago, of part of which he was swindled, while he has dissipated the rest. He has now turned swindler himself, and is well known to the police in one of the provincial towns through his depredations on tradespeople, and he ought to be treated as an incorrigible.

An old acquaintance of mine and my readers, "Dr." Caleb Whitefoord, received a sentence of ten years' penal servitude last week at the hands of the Lord Chief Justice upon conviction of performing an illegal operation. Although the sentence was heavy, it was no more than he deserved. Whitefoord is a disreputable and apparently incorrigible old scoundrel. He has served five years already for a similar offence, and I have no doubt that he has been repeating it systematically for years, as seems to have been the opinion of the police in the statement made to the Lord Chief Justice. This occupation he combined with the sale of quack remedies, one at least of which—his "Appendicitis Pill"—was a downright fraud.

A fortnight ago I called attention in my Legal Pillory to two cases heard at Epsom Petty Sessions before a Bench on which Sir William Vincent and Mr. Simpson Rostron were reported to be present. One of the cases was that of a man who was fined 10s. and costs for wife assault, the other that of a motor cyclist who was fined £8 for dangerous driving and failing to stop when called upon to do so. Now Mr. Rostron has written to remonstrate with me for not giving full details of the cyclist's case, and to point out that neither himself nor Sir W. Vincent adjudicated in the wife beating case. As regards the latter complaint I can only say that the report from a local paper which came under my attention gave no hint that any of the magistrates had departed before the day's work was finished. As regards not having given full details of the cyclist's case, I can only say that these would not have materially affected the object with which the two cases were included in my Pillory. Possibly the fines inflicted upon the cyclist may be justified on the ground that he had been twice previously convicted, but, at the same time, the fact remains that there is an enormous disparity in the punishment accorded the cyclist and the wife-beater, and it was to make this point clear that I called attention to the cases.

Only the other day I mentioned that Mr. E. P. Phillips had, for the first time in my long knowledge of him, brought out one number of the Railway Supplies Journal. This feat does not seem, however, to have satisfied the reasonable requirements of all who have paid money for notices of their patents or businesses in this intermittent publication, for on Saturday Phillips was brought up at Old-street on a charge of obtaining 10s. by false pretences from a patentee who was desirous of a place of honour in the R.S.J. As he is now under remand, all one can say about the case is that it is to be hoped that full justice will be done to him.

THE (YANKEE) HARE AND THE (BRITISH) TORTOISE.

(An Object Lesson in Slickness.)

The Yankees are a slap-dash race—
  In their own estimation,
Who boast, for promptitude and pace,
  They whip the whole Creation.

And while we're making up our mind
  How best our course to shape, sir,
They, leaving us whole laps behind,
  Are breasting now the tape, sir.

Thus vaunts the Hare in Æsop's saw.
  To make the likeness plainer—
For Hare, read case of Harry Thaw,
  For Tortoise, that of Rayner.

Besides flaunting the advertisements of "Dr. Sanden's electro-medical inventions" in the Indian newspapers, the Bombay agency of this notorious quack concern is conducting a circularising campaign on the usual Yankee plan. Anybody who fails to reply to the first circular is favoured with a "follow up" in which Sanden coolly says that he is "led to believe" that his previous communication has been delayed in the mails or mislaid. He "does not desire to force his attentions upon any one," but it seems that if they wish to be freed from the annoyance of receiving his circulars they must take the trouble to send him an intimation to that effect. I have always understood that the Indian police have very extensive powers for dealing with pests of the Sanden type, and it is a pity that they do not adopt measures for the suppression of this mischievous business.

Modestly veiling his identity under the pseudonym of "Calculator," a certain A. Newman, of 6, Ingate-terrace, S.W., is advertising for partners with £100 to £500 to join him in working a betting system which "differs from others in that it has been successful in actual operations, not merely on paper, for over thirty years." The circular which he sends to inquirers states that the profits each racing season are at the rate of £100 on each £25 of capital. At this rate, as a simple multiplication sum will prove, a man starting to work the system with the modest capital of £25 would—on Newman's showing—be making a profit of millions a year in less than ten years. The veracious Newman says that this wonderful method of amassing wealth has actually been in operation for upwards of thirty years; yet instead of selfishly using his priceless knowledge of it for his own personal benefit, he is spending time, and money too, in trying to persuade strangers to let him pile up fortunes for them. The only condition he imposes is that they shall first of all trust him with their cash, and human credulity is so boundless and bottomless that I have no doubt a number will do so.

Another philanthropist of a similar species is James Holt, of 17, Ferndale-road, Liverpool. He is a racing tipster, but with rare modesty he admits the possibility that his prophecies may not invariably come off. His clients are, however, "absolutely insured" against loss by means of what he calls his "retrievers," these being "several good horses, trained in different stables," in which he has, he says, acquired an interest. "It is my idea," continues Holt, "to pop them into selling races in moderate company. They will be slipped on finding we are on the wrong side towards any week-end, and so 'retrieve' the situation." Putting aside the consideration that slipping is not winning—"there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip"—the notion of a tipster keeping several good horses for such a purpose is surely too silly for the belief of even the greenest of greenhorns.

My paragraph last week anent the Sporting Globe Special has brought me a letter from the editor of that publication. I commented upon the obviously suggestive fact that a specimen copy of the Special, sent to one of my readers on a Thursday but bearing the date of the previous Monday, gave four winners out of five tips for the Tuesday and Wednesday, but eight losers out of nine tips for the remaining three days of the week. The distribution of tipsters' sheets, actually printed after the tipster knows the results of some of the races for which he gives what purport to be predictions, is a dodge that I have frequently exposed. In this case the editor of the Sporting Globe contradicts my statement as to the number of the losers from the Thursday to the Saturday.

The statement I made was perfectly accurate so far as the most conspicuous list of tips in the paper was concerned, but, like some of its bigger contemporaries, this Special appears to give three or four different series of selections—the reader pays his money and takes his choice—and the editor refers me to one lot in which there were two winners out of the five horses named. However, his main point is a repudiation of the idea that the specimen copy of the paper was faked. He says that if the party who sent it to me had been a subscriber, "he would have received the copy in the ordinary course on Tuesday." "We are prepared," the editor adds, "to swear an affidavit if it will please your worthy self." I have no desire that he should swear. Yet I fear that there is a possibility that he may do so when I say that, waiving this question of the specimen copy, I agree with Lord Durham that tipsters' sheets such as this Sporting Globe Special are a curse to the Turf, and that in my own opinion they are also a curse to the community.

It seems desirable to repeat the warnings that have been given in Truth, particularly to people in the West of England, against attractive-looking advertisements of cheap bicycles, purporting to emanate from private individuals in the neighbourhood of Weston-super-Mare. It is more than likely that these advertisements are really issued by the firm of Warrilow and Co., whose name will be found in the last Truth Cautionary List. An advertisement has lately appeared in the Western Morning News headed "Cycle—Marvellous Sacrifice—Gent's new 1907 Machine," with a full specification of the article, which is offered at £4 10s., and said to be worth double. The advertiser describes himself as A. House, St. Madge, Pitman-road, Weston-super-Mare. A correspondent reports that on answering this advertisement out of curiosity, the machine was sent to him at once on approval, accompanied by a circular from Warrilow and Co. It proved to be a new machine, of course of the very cheapest class, and he had the pleasure of paying 5s. carriage on it, as well as the trouble of sending it back.

Here is another example of the trickery which seems to be a regular feature of the system of credit trading which is now so widely carried on by post. A soldier is tempted by an advertisement of J. N. Masters, Limited, of Rye, to treat himself to a gold ring priced at £2; and, in accordance with the terms offered, he forwards a deposit of 5s. and an undertaking to pay 5s. a month. Masters acknowledges the receipt of the 5s., but sends another form for signature, in which the customer promises to pay 8s. on receipt of the article and the balance by 6s. a month. The man refuses to sign this, and asks for his money back. To this the reply is: "If you do not intend to proceed with the order, we must request you to purchase goods to the value of the deposit for our trouble and expenses." This impudent attempt at extortion is, of course, only made in the belief that a soldier in the ranks is not likely to take the necessary steps for the recovery of his money, and that he can, therefore, be bluffed into carrying out a bargain which was not the one he entered into. It should be a warning to men against all dealings with firms of this class.

It seems desirable to warn all inexperienced literary amateurs against a man named Richard Lewis, who is carrying on business at 75, Fetter-lane, E.C., under the style of Lewis and Co., Literary and Advertising Agents. In a case that has come under my notice Lewis persuaded a writer to entrust an MS. to him under an iniquitous agreement by which one-third of the proceeds of the sale was to go to the author and two-thirds to Lewis. The MS. was sold for £50, payable by two instalments. Lewis paid the author his share of the first £25, but has stuck to the whole of the second, which was paid on the 19th of last November, down to the present moment. A second gentleman was employed by Lewis to revise the same MS. for publication. He has never been paid at all.

Before referring to this matter I gave Lewis an opportunity of explaining his conduct. A seedy-looking individual called at this office for the purpose, but all he could say was that Lewis would explain matters on his return to town. This was more than a month ago, and repeated applications in the interval to extract further communications from Lewis have failed. The gentleman above referred to who revised the MS. states that he was introduced to Lewis by the Governor of one of H.M. prisons, who had formerly had the man under his charge and believed him to be a reformed character. Evidently the process of reformation has not been carried far enough, and it might be a good thing for everybody if the Governor had an opportunity of resuming the treatment.

Careful parents usually keep an eye on the literary matter of the periodicals which their children patronise, but in these days it is quite as needful to study the advertisements. An indignant father sends me the results obtained by a small boy for an investment of 7d. in response to the advertisement of one Hackett, of July-road, Liverpool, in a boy's paper called the Union Jack. Hackett advertises what he calls "The Yankee Marvel," which "produces your own photograph in a few seconds," adding: "Will produce thousands. . . . Ready for use. . . . Even a child can work it." "The Yankee Marvel" consists of two or three worthless glass negatives of photographs of the "midget" size, a few slips of prepared card of the same size, and a minute quantity of soda and some other stuff, apparently for toning and fixing. "Directions for use" explain how the negatives may be printed on to the card, but how the child, who has been done out of sevenpence by this trick, is to "produce his own photograph" is not explained—for the best of reasons.

Not content with the first sevenpence, Hackett despatches with his "Yankee Marvel" a price list of other novelties likely to prove attractive to small boys. Here is something for the special benefit of ten-year-olds:—

Another Offer, My Boy!

Send 2s. 4d. for six cameras, post free. What age are you? Say you are only 10 years, it is time you started to make money. I have got 500,000 little Perfect Cameras I have bought cheap, there are directions with each camera how to work it, also it is fitted with a lens, and is well worth a couple of shillings each. They are packed in boxes of six cameras to each box. Now you send me the price I paid per half-dozen cameras, that is per box, and after I have added a few pence which is 2s. 4d. per half-dozen, then you sell and make what you can get from 6d. to 2s. each. See what you will make, and I am sure they will sell ready enough.

In one respect, at any rate, Hackett does not overstate the truth. Cameras must certainly be "bought cheap" to be retailed with a profit at 2s. 4d. the half-dozen—especially when they possess the peculiar advantage of being "fitted with a lens."

In view of a letter that has been sent on to me by the recipient, signed Emily G. Henville, and dated from Braughing, near Ware, it seems desirable to repeat the numerous warnings that have been given in Truth against the begging operations of the Henville family. Emily G. Henville appears to be one of the daughters of this interesting house, and she bases her appeal on the usual story of the mother's illness and a long catalogue of domestic troubles. Probably the only true statement in it is contained in the sentence "we owe money in the village." Emily says that they are about to remove to Oxford, and wherever they go people should be on their guard against them, for they are professional mendicants of a specially undeserving class.

The following letter was recently addressed to an aged lady in the North of England, well known for her benevolent disposition, by the vicar of a neighbouring town. Being willing to believe that it is written in all sincerity, and not with the object of getting a cheap trip to Norway, I do not give his reverence's name; but it is really an extraordinary thing that a gentleman in such a position can believe as much as this in the twentieth century—probably on no better evidence than something he has read in the newspapers. It does not seem to have occurred to him that if he was right in his facts the clergy of all denominations and all nationalities, to say nothing of the laity, have as much reason as himself for a visit to Christiania:—

My Dear Friend,—On Wednesday morning I start (God willing) to travel to Christiania and at once return.

I go because the Holy Spirit is descending there as on the Day of Pentecost, with wonderful signs of the Gift of Tongues.

I need more of the Holy Ghost for the sake of my people, and that a great work may begin. I am going in faith, though one friend has promised to help. The rail is £10 return, and there will be food, etc., say £2.

If you could help me God would bless you in return, I know.

I do not go for pleasure, but to get a Blessing (the best pleasure of all).

Would it be too much to ask you to send me a wire? Say ——— "Will send you some help," or "Sorry cannot help."—In great haste, your affectionate and ever grateful friend, ———.

It is quite a mistake for the reverend gentleman who writes the foregoing epistle to suppose that in these days signs and wonders are by any means confined to Christiania. The New World is the place to look for them in the greatest abundance. The Prophet Dowie has ceased to prophesy, and to collect gifts from the faithful, but there is not likely to be any lack of successors to compete for his mantle. A solicitor in the country sent me the other day a wondrous journal which had been posted to him from America in conjunction with a pamphlet. The journal, which is garnished with the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes, as appropriate emblems of faith, is entitled "Shiloh's Messenger of Wisdom." It is said to be "published monthly at Boston Harbour, Mich., U.S.A., by Mary and Benjamin;" but for some reason unexplained it is dated "Jerusalem, Ninth Month, Fourth Year of the New Creation."

Truth compels me to say that Mary and Benjamin, who seem to be really a firm of publishers, do not shine as journalists. The editorial matter of the "Messenger of Wisdom" reads like the ravings of wild-eyed evangelists at street corners on Sunday evenings. The news matter relates chiefly to the doings of the disciples of Mary and Benjamin, whom I take to be literally travellers for the firm. They appear to go forth in couples, each of one male and one female, like the inmates of the Ark. Thus Birdie and David are in South Wales; Olive and William are at Brighton; Lydia and Stephen in the less salubrious atmosphere of Barking; Mary and John in Australia; and Octavius and Alice in New Zealand. The business side of their efforts seems to be revealed in the following "Notice! To all Believers and Workers for the Deliverance of Israel":—

Let one and all go forth in their labour of love. Let nothing hinder you in spreading the good news of Shiloh's Message containing the glad tidings of redemption full and complete. . . . . .

If each subscriber would send the addresses and $2.00 for twenty 3 months' subscriptions, or the same for ten 6 months' subscriptions, or $1.00 for ten 3 months' subscriptions, it would help wonderfully to spread the word. . . . .

We will, in addition to this, send to each one a Little Book, for which many have said they would not take $5.00.

Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days. Eccl. 11. i.

A very good motto in business, for it takes time to build up a connection in journalism as in all other trades, even with your travellers working all over the world as busily as Birdie and David, Olive and William, and the rest of them, seem to be, judging by their reports to headquarters.

The following portions of the Shiloh's Message are also of importance to those seeking redemption:—

Yearly subscription, 50 Cents. Single copies, 5 Cents.
Make all Money Orders payable to Mary Purnell, in U.S. currency.

We are binding the Star of Bethlehem, the Living Roll of Life, into four books of 200 pages each. . . . Price: 50 cents each; $2.00 for the complete work. Postal money orders preferred, made payable to Mary Purnell, in United States currency.

Another message to much the same effect is contained in a leaflet entitled "The Ingathering of Israel":—

We have booklets, and publish an eight-page paper, called "Shiloh's Messenger of Wisdom"; full of reading matter; no advertisements; issued monthly; only 50 cents a year; and a book of 256 pages, entitled "The Book of Wisdom." It is written, Men die for the want of wisdom (Prov. 10-21). Why will ye die, O House of Israel? (Ezek. 33-11). The "Book of Wisdom" is 50 cents. And a roll of a book, sent by the hand of an angel (Ezek. 2-9), entitled "The Star of Bethlehem, the Living Roll of Life" (Zech. 5-1), containing 780 pages; price $2.00. My sheep know my voice, and a stranger they will not follow (John, 10-5). . . . . When writing always sign your name in full. Money orders made payable to Mary Purnell.

The ingathering of Israel seems, therefore, very closely connected with the ingathering of the United States currency.

THE BITERS BITTED.

This biting, kicking, female crew
How best shall we restrain?
Why, curb them, as we fillies do,
With bridle and with rein.

Aye, punishment to crime let's fit,
And, till they have submitted—
On principle of biter bit—
Let's have these biters bitted.

The blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church, it is said, and to a certain extent it probably was. When a number of persons really accept genuine martyrdom rather than refuse to air their views and to adjure others to accept them, it is pretty fair proof that they deem this acceptance of considerable value to the world. I do not agree with those Russians who consider that they have a right to assassinate any official who opposes the triumph of their political doctrines, although I agree with them that the will of the nation should prevail in Russia as elsewhere. But at least it may be said for the Russian political assassin that he fully accepts the risks of his act, and goes to prison or the scaffold without whimpering. But the case is very different with the dames and damsels who insist on rioting within the precincts of Parliament, in order to draw attention to their cause and to themselves.

There is little risk, or even inconvenience, in the proceedings of these females. They are sent to prison for a short period with the option of a fine. But when they choose the former they receive exceptional treatment because they are women. When they emerge they are fêted by the rest of the little band at some fashionable restaurant, when they announce that they will do it again, only more so, and they declare that they will rather sacrifice their lives than obey the law. What does this nonsense mean? That they love notoriety, and rejoice in this cheap martyrdom. These speeches are reported in the newspapers, and some silly dame or damsel becomes a household word for the moment. If the Christian martyrs had got off as easily as this, they would not have advanced the cause in which they believed, nor would their names have been sanctified by the Church for which they fought.

Personally I am for old age pensions being granted to men and women who have passed their lives in honest, decent work. But I would only give them to those who have done so, and who really require the money to live in decent comfort. I see no reason why ne'er-do-wells, who have shirked work, and, when they have condescended to do a job, have spent the greater part of what they have earned in spirituous liquor, should be given 5s. per week when they become old, to spend in the same way. From the nature of the case they will have to be provided with some kind of board and lodging, as now, at the public expense under the Poor Law, and the minimum of Poor Law relief, in the least attractive shape, is all they are entitled to. I think that women have a greater claim than men. They are handicapped in the struggle for existence. In the main, unskilled labour requires more muscle than Heaven has vouchsafed to them, and when they do work fitted for both sexes, they get a lower wage than the men. I have, indeed, far more sympathy for women and children than I have for men. I am, therefore, as strongly for their having old age pensions as I am against their having votes.

I thoroughly despise those persons who try to pose as friends of the working man by advocating some specious reform, which, they must be well aware, if they have a grain of common sense, it would be impossible to effect. None of these is more foolish than the theory that any man has a right to be provided with employment and to receive the current wage for it. Why is he unable to get work? Either because he has not tried to find it, or because he has tried and failed. If he has honestly tried to obtain it and failed, it is obvious that there is no work for him to do. I may regret this, but my regret no more alters the fact than that disease can be abolished by proclamation. A temporary stagnation in the labour market may be met by temporary work being provided, but the only right of this kind that the citizen can have is to be employed where remunerative work is to be found, and, failing that, to be provided with clothes, shelter, and the food necessary to prevent him from starving. This may be a hard saying, but so are many truths. Who would make an effort to secure work, if he were certain that it would be provided for him?

Let us suppose that for some cause or other there are thousands of tailors out of work, and that we cannot find a market for the stock of clothes that we have already manufactured. Are we to make more superfluous clothes, or are we to provide these tailors with work as navvies? If so, are they to be paid a navvy's wage, although, owing to their not being used to this business, they would do less than half what a navvy does in a day? And yet there are men who pass as friends of the working men by the simple expedient of telling them that they have a right to be provided with work! To act upon such a doctrine would eventually ruin the most wealthy country in the world.

"PRETTY FANNY" AGAIN.

When Balfour did "conspiracy"
And "crime" 'gainst Ministers allege,
The Speaker ruled he should not be Condemned for Breach of Privilege;

Implying—or to that it came—
That whatsoever words he spoke,
They don't in Balfour mean the same
As they would mean in other folk.

In brief, 'twere foolish fuss to make
O'er aught this pettish scold might say,
Since—the Lone Ploughman's phrase to take—
"'Tis only pretty Fanny's way."

It is tolerably safe to say that such a programme of legislation as M. Stolypin presented to the Duma last week has never been put before a legislative assembly since constitutional government was first thought of. The liberty of the subject is to be recognised; "administrative exile" abolished; freedom of conscience established; civil law and the administration of justice are to be reformed on Western models, and a new criminal code introduced; the entire fabric of municipal government is to be reorganised; land is to be provided for the landless, and whole series of Bills presented for ameliorating the condition of the peasants; free education is to be established, with compulsory education to follow; and so on through the whole field of legislative possibility. Roughly speaking, Russia is to traverse at one stride the whole road through which we in England have toiled between the reigns of King John and King Edward VII.

If in this country a Government packed the business of half-a-dozen revolutions into one King's Speech, it would simply be laughed at. The Tsar and his advisers evidently desire to be taken seriously; but they must expect that the Duma is going to accept all the measures presented to it in a spirit of submissive acquiescence, and pass them with little discussion or amendment, for no legislative assembly will be able to get through such a task on any other terms. That this is the expectation is also shown by the frank declaration of M. Stolypin that it is not the function of the Duma either to express confidence in the Government or to censure it. This implies a conception of the rights of a legislative assembly somewhat at variance with the general spirit of the Government programme, with its eulogistic references to representative government and Western ideals.

Moreover, the Government is all this time engaged in deadly conflict with the forces of revolution. Apparently the country is to understand that the Tsar and his Ministers have not the least objection to a revolution, provided that they are allowed to carry it out in their own way, and that nobody else interferes, not even the Duma. To the British mind this mixture of autocracy with constitutional forms and revolutionary ideas is rather bewildering, but in the circumstances of Russia it may have its advantages for the people as well as for the monarch.

That M. Pobiedonostseff should finally pass off the scene at this juncture is rather in keeping with the fitness of things. It almost looks as if the meeting of the second Duma and the programme of M. Stolypin had killed the high-priest of Autocracy. There is a type of man peculiar to Russia, in which the keenest intellect and the dryest rationalism are combined with the fervid enthusiasm of the fanatic. We see it in many of the "intellectual" revolutionaries. Pobiedonostseff seems to have been their counterpart on the other side of politics. He united the theories of Hobbes with the practice of Torquemada. If his opinions were not founded on pure reason, they were permeated and directed by it, but in enforcing them he was like a man crazed by religious enthusiasm. He has been looked upon as the embodiment of cruelty, but in the executions, and massacres, and other tyrannies which have made his name odious, he probably was not actuated by any lust of blood or delight in inflicting torture for its own sake, but by a reasoned belief that cruelty was the kindest course, and that he was labouring humanely for the greatest good of the greatest number. But of all types of human nature this is the most terrible, especially when it wields great power, and he was rightly hated.

THE DEGENERATE RABBIT.

Once in a Burrow, as I find,
A Rabbit of the lop-eared Kind,
In Size, in Strength, in Courage best,
Ruled Monarch over all the Rest.
So there he reigned for many a Day,
Bearing supreme, unquestioned Sway;
And when, at length, his Life was done,
He left behind an eldest Son,
To whose Lop-ears the common Crowd,
As to his Sire's, submissive bowed.
Now, this was odd, because, you see,
Naught but his Sire's Lop-ears had he.
The Strength, by which that Sire had won
Renown, had passed not to the Son,
Nor eke his brave and fearless Sprite,
Nor Hinder-legs unmatched in Fight.
In short, this Rabbit stood confessed
A poor, degenerate Bun at best.
Yet, that despite, the common Train
Still bowed submissive to his Reign,
Controlled by Force of Habit sheer
To rev'rence a lop-sided Ear.
At length an independent Rabbit,
Who's not such abject Slave of Habit,
Bethought to ask the Reason why
They yield to these Pretensions high,
Whose sole Foundation seemed the mere Succession to a lop-side Ear.
So off at once he skipped, hot-foot,
And to the Rest his Question put.
Amazed, and deeply shocked, they heard
That bold, bad Rabbit's daring Word.
"Great Guns! What next, audacious Fool,
Who question thus his Right to rule;
Which Right most plain in him appears
As Heir to the paternal Ears."
"Paternal Ears!" cried Bun. "Oh, Ferrets!
What's Ears, without paternal Merits?"

Moral.

Men may their Coronets transmit,
But not therewith their Brains nor Grit;
Which Fact, much Food for Thought affords
Anent our British House of Lords—
Based on that most grotesque Foundation:
Hereditary Legislation!

SCRUTATOR.

THE PRESS AND THE ADVERTISER.

THE letter printed below rather exceeds the space that I am usually able to allow my correspondents, but as it relates an interesting series of experiences and cannot be curtailed without robbing it of much of its effect, I strain a point to make room for the principal part of it. Although the writer boldly signed his name, I have taken upon myself to remove his signature, feeling that any responsibility attaching to the publication had better rest with me. The accuracy of his narrative is beyond question, as he appends to his letter the whole of the correspondence referred to in it, though there is no occasion to publish this mass of documents:—

Dear Sir,—In January of last year my attention was called by the British Medical Journal to an application by the "Bile Beans Company" for an Order in Court against a firm of chemists in Edinburgh, and to Lord Ardwell's judgment:—He refused the Order, with costs against the plaintiff, on the ground (amongst others) that they were entitled to no protection from the law, as their business was "founded and conducted by fraud."

Soon afterwards I noticed that my paper, the Daily News (to which I had subscribed for some years) was inserting this company's advertisement, and I wrote to the editor on January 31, asking him to express his opinion on the policy of misleading the public by admitting this fraudulent company's advertisements into the columns of his paper. He took no notice of my letter, and I wrote again on February 22, without result. On March 9 I sent him a copy of my first letter and a penny stamp. This elicited a reply from the advertisement manager (see "A") saying "the result of the case was appealed against, and will shortly come before the Scottish Court." I wrote again, on the 15th, to the editor, inquiring whether the statement given by his advertisement manager had been verified, and asking, also, if he accepted the responsibility arising from the insertion of advertisements collected by his advertising manager? I enclosed a stamp again, but was not accorded any reply. And I repeated my inquiries on the 22nd and 29th; and on the 29th I received a letter (marked "B") declining to make any further reply on the matter.

Consequently I cancelled my subscription to the Daily News, and, searching for some other daily paper, found the Tribune to be the only honest daily journal published in London.

The next day, March 30, I was concerned to find the Graphic (which I had taken in for thirty years) following the same dishonourable course, and I sent a similar protest to the editor of that paper, and informed him that my subscription would cease unless he assured me this advertisement should not again appear. But he did not do so, and I at once gave it up.

I should have informed you that I wrote to the Home Secretary on March 27, calling his attention to the subject, and suggesting that a circular, warning the press, should be issued by his Department, and also that the Bile Beans Company should be cautioned about inserting their advertisements in future; and he promised that the matter should have his attention. (See "C.")

On April 5, another weekly paper that I had taken in since its inception, M. A. P., and sent three copies abroad every week, followed suit, and received my protest, and an intimation of my intention to discontinue taking it in if the advertisement was repeated. But the editor gave me no assurance, and I stopped it.

A few months afterwards a new paper appeared, entitled the Reader, which I thought would supply the place of M. A. P. and interest my friends abroad, and this hope was gratified until December 5, when a full-page Bile Beans announcement appeared in glowing colour on the back cover. I wrote at once to the editor my usual protest, with intimation of my refusal to subscribe to it, if the advertisement again appeared; but I had no acknowledgment of my letter, and on January 3 they repeated the offence, whereupon I wrote him again, and informed him of my intention to lay the matter before the Public Prosecutor, and asked for an acknowledgment of my previous letter, sending a stamp for that purpose; but he failed to reply to this letter, as well as to another on the 10th. On the 16th I wrote to the publishers (Edward Lloyd, Limited) and called their attention to my letters, and asked them if they accepted responsibility? But their general manager wrote me on the 17th that they were "not disposed to enter into correspondence on the subject." (See "D.")

Consequently, on January 19, I wrote to the Public Prosecutor fully upon the subject, and I send you his reply (see "E.") which I considered very unsatisfactory, and I addressed a further letter to him on February 7, pointing out that "every one who purchased the Bile Beans Company's goods, through these advertisements, was defrauded of his money," and that I was "under the impression that the Public Prosecutor's rôle is to take action in the public interest, when a private prosecutor fails to do so. To obtain money fraudulently is a criminal offence, and if your Lordship will peruse the judgment of Lord Ardwall, referred to in my last, you will, I am sure, decide that the offence of the Bile Beans Company is aggravated by their instigating the proprietors of newspapers, and other publications, to conspire in carrying out their fraudulent practices, by the insertion of their advertisements. Possibly the best way to get public attention given to the scandal will be to request a member of the House of Commons to ask the Home Secretary whether (as is the case) his attention has been called to the matter, and what he intends to do to remedy it?"

To this communication he vouchsafed no reply, and on the 18th and 25th I repeated my inquiry, whereupon his deputy wrote to me on the 27th that he had nothing to add to his previous letter. (See "F.")

Meanwhile these fraudulent advertisements continued to sprout out intermittently in other publications that I subscribed to, and on January 16 of this year, I found it necessary to include the London Magazine in my Index Expurgatorius. This magazine I have taken in from the commencement, and have the series of eighteen volumes, but my principles rose again in rebellion, and my protest went to the editor the same day. He maintained a discreet silence, and also failed to reply to my repetition of the 23rd, so that on February 1 I wrote to the publishers (the Amalgamated Press, Limited), who informed me, on the 4th, that my letter had been handed to Mather and Crowther, Limited, their advertising agents (see "G.") upon which, on the 5th, I put the usual inquiry as to whether they accepted full responsibility for the insertion of these advertisements? The same day I received a communication from Mather and Crowther, Limited (see "H") saying (inter alia) that as this advertisement was accepted by newspapers in all parts of the country, they saw no cause to reject it for the one publication to which I was paying attention; and that as I was in communication with the Home Office and the Public Prosecutor, it was unnecessary for them to make any further investigation. . . . .

I omitted to mention that, in addition to the other papers, Modern Society received my protest on February 8 last year, was entered on my Index, and, getting no reply, my subscription ceased.

I have now, after the interval of twelve months, asked the Home Secretary what steps, if any, were taken with regard to my complaint of March, 1906? And his deputy replies as follows:—(See "I.")

> "Whitehall, March 13, 1907. SIR,—With reference to your letter of the 6th instant, I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that he has carefully considered the matter which you have brought to his notice, but he does not see his way to take any action therein."

But what can anyone expect from the Home Office?

I think, Sir, it is time that you were invited to say a few more pungent words upon this matter. The Bile Beans Company duly appears in the "Cautionary List" for the p— year, and if I were a millionaire I would have this list published in every paper in the kingdom; for a very small percentage of the population (and that not of people whom it should reach to benefit in this instance) have the privilege of seeing TRUTH, which with the Tribune, Punch, a gardening paper, and the Bystander completes the series of honest papers still left for my support.—I am, dear Sir, very faithfully yours,

It is a distressing picture that this gentleman draws of himself, throwing over one by one his daily papers, weekly journals, and monthly magazines in the effort to escape the haunting presence of Bile Beans. Up and down Fleet-street and the adjacent thoroughfares he has wended his weary way in search of an honest newspaper, like a latter-day Diogenes; and at the end of the journey he has bagged but five. It is a trifle above the percentage of righteous men in the Cities of the Plain, and that is about the best that can be said for it. The state of the case looks worse when one reflects that the test which the investigator applied was not of a very severe character. His definition of honesty rests on nothing wider than the express finding of the highest Scottish courts (the judgment of Lord Ardwall in the Bile Beans case was subsequently affirmed on appeal) that the business in question was founded upon fraudulent advertising. If his objection had extended to all advertisements which are palpably dishonest, or of doubtful honesty, or of a mischievous tendency for some other reason, he could have found dozens of grounds for impeaching the newspaper trade where he has limited himself to one. The Bile Beans test, therefore, cannot be said to try the press very high.

A few days before the receipt of the above letter I had another, protesting against the growing practice of publishing advertisements without the slightest indication of their real character—on the contrary, every effort to make them look like editorial matter. The paper which had provoked the protest was a London evening journal with an honoured name, but there seems no occasion to single it out for special condemnation, seeing that precisely similar advertisements have appeared of late in the once irreproachable columns of the Times. "Presumably," said my correspondent, "the price offered for the suppression of any indication that the article is an advertisement is too tempting to be refused; but it seems to me, and must to most people, that a gross deception is thus practised upon the readers of the paper, and that the practice cannot be too strongly condemned or too speedily abandoned." I agree cordially. The practice began in the columns of the struggling local papers, whose proprietors might salve their consciences with the plea that "a man must live." That it should have extended upwards until even the Times is not ashamed to resort to it, is a significant proof of the increasing disposition of the press to sacrifice all other considerations to hard cash in the management of the advertisement department.

I have been discussing this question for more years than I care to think of, and I am now reluctantly arriving at the conclusion that it is hopeless to look to the press itself for any serious attempt to check abuses of advertising—even the grossest of them. The only possibility of that would lie in a combined movement, loyally supported by the whole newspaper trade.

In the face of the increasing keenness of the struggle for existence among newspapers, to propose such co-operation as this would seem like amiable insanity. Moreover, if any disposition for concerted action existed, it is doubtful whether any practicable method of attaining the desired end could be found. Every journal must therefore take its own course, and that course is bound to be more or less down stream, for no one, however noble his intentions, can swim against the stream by his own unaided efforts. A newspaper is merely a commercial undertaking, and the only possible policy in business is the policy that pays.

To say this is by no means to say that there is no possibility of checking abuses of newspaper advertising. What cannot be expected from inside may be accomplished from outside. The matter, in fact, rests with the general public and the general body of advertisers—and chiefly with the public—for with them it rests entirely whether any particular policy does or does not pay. The public does not by any means appreciate the fact that the existence of every periodical depends entirely upon advertisements. The revenue from sales, except in the case of quite exceptional circulations, can do little more than cover the cost of producing a paper; the advertisements yield the real profits of the business. As a commercial "proposition"—to use the current slang of the City—a newspaper does not differ essentially from a hoarding. The chief difference between the two things is that the rental value of a hoarding is fixed once and for all by the site it occupies, and cannot be improved, whereas the value of a newspaper as a medium for advertisements rises or falls with its circulation. Every person, therefore, who buys a paper contributes his mite to the proprietor's profits, not through the halfpenny or penny or sixpence that he disburses, but by the fact that he is one more possible reader of advertisements, and one more possible customer for the firms that advertise in the paper. That is why we all want to sell more copies, and why some of us brag so much about our big circulations. At present the public seems to judge its newspapers chiefly by their bonâ-fide literary contents, and to care very little what is offered for its reading in the shape of advertisements. As long as this is so, the proprietor naturally exhibits on his hoarding anything that he is paid to stick up. It is no use saying that he ought to be guided by ethical considerations as well as the desire for profits. To begin with, in the present day a great many newspapers and magazines are owned by joint-stock companies, which possess no corporate conscience, and no substitute for one. It has been shown over and over again that shareholders approve of no policy that interferes with dividends, and shareholders are the employers and masters of directors. There are still private individuals who, fortunately or unfortunately for themselves, own newspapers. But, conceding to them the normal endowment of conscience, they have to compete with the journals owned by conscienceless corporations, and if they are to compete at all they must compete on equal terms. They must, therefore, give up either business or conscience, and for the purpose of the present argument it must be assumed that they do not propose to give up business.

That is why I say that the question what advertisements shall or shall not be published rests chiefly with the public. If they do not read advertisements, or do not object to what they read in them, the question is not worth further discussion. If they do read and do object, then they should signify their disapproval in the same way as the writer of the letter published above. This course does not involve any excessive measure of self-denial. My correspondent is still able to take Truth, the Tribune, Punch, the Bystander, and an unnamed gardening paper. There is something here to suit all tastes and all purses, but the weaker brother who has become the slave of the newspaper habit might perhaps add one or two more to the list without running serious risk. It is interesting, if true, to know that Bile Beans are not found in gardening papers. Of course they are not a horticultural product, but I suspect the real explanation to be that gardeners are not of a bilious habit. I should not expect to find Bile Beans in a golfing or a rowing paper. It might be otherwise with a journal devoted to motoring, or photography. But this is an irrelevant digression, for which I apologise.

Advertisers, however, as I have said, have an interest in this matter as well as the public. Apparently they are very far from appreciating it at present. Whatever discredits newspaper advertising must affect the value of all advertisements. When a newspaper reader has once answered an advertisement and found himself taken in, he is not likely to do the same thing again. Consequently, so far as he is concerned, every future advertisement published in that paper is worthless to the advertiser, whether the reader continues to take in the paper or not. As reader after reader incurs the same experience, the value of the paper as an advertising medium becomes substantially reduced, notwithstanding that its sale may be maintained. Seeing that there are numbers of journals and magazines in which notorious swindles are continuously advertised day after day and month after month, it would seem that their readers must largely consist of people who never look at the advertisements, and that their value for the purpose of legitimate advertising is very small, whatever they may say about their circulations. Again, the advertisement columns of many journals—I almost wrote "most"—teem with announcements which, if not open to other objections, are grossly offensive to large numbers of people. If in these cases the paper is able to maintain its sale, it is quite certain that a substantial proportion of its readers turn away from the advertisement columns in disgust. Every legitimate advertisement that appears in the same column or the same page loses its effect in consequence. It follows that advertisers who make a genuine appeal to the public, and have no reason to be ashamed of their announcements, have as good a right as the public to object to all abuses of advertising, and an even stronger interest in refusing their custom to journals conducted on the principle that anything may be published for which payment on the usual scale is forthcoming. That advertisers, however, do not as a rule appreciate either their rights or their interests in this matter is pretty obvious, or one would not see every day the advertisements of respectable houses of business in the same pages as the "flat-traps" of swindlers or notices and pictures which are calculated to disgust every decent-minded reader.

When one says, then, that the only possible policy in the management of a newspaper, or any other business, is the policy that pays, it has still to be borne in mind that, in the matter of advertising, what will or will not pay depends upon the public and the advertisers. My own experience has led me to the conclusion that a reasonable measure of discrimination in the matter of advertisements is a paying policy. For that reason it has been followed in Truth. But I lay claim to no more exalted motive, and when I find that the public does not care what advertisements are published, and that respectable advertisers do not care what disreputable company they keep, it will be necessary for me to think of opening my columns not only to Bile Beans, but to dozens of other announcements which are at present rigorously excluded. I take the opportunity of saying this because I observe that the tendency of the times is very strong. The press falls more and more under the domination of the advertiser and the advertisement agent. If they have their way every journal will before long mix up editorial matter and advertisements inextricably; every advertisement will have an editorial notice of some kind published concurrently with it, no discrimination between one advertisement and another in the interests of the public will be possible. That the advertiser and the advertisement agent have the power to bring about all this if they choose is obvious. The fact that newspaper profits are derived almost entirely from advertisements necessarily gives them the command of the situation so far as the newspaper offices are concerned. But they may use their power wisely or unwisely. To convert a newspaper into an advertisement sheet, interlarded with just enough reading matter to sell it, may prove to be killing the goose for the sake of its eggs. After all, a journalist who knows his business is the best judge of the interests of his advertisers as well as his own, for the two are indissolubly bound up together. And my impression is that the better he knows his business, the cleaner he will keep his advertisement columns, and the more strictly he will draw the line between the advertisements and the rest of his paper. If advertisers are wise they will use the power they undoubtedly possess to support every effort in those directions, and to resist all the abuses that are now growing up in connection with newspaper advertising.

THE CATHOLIC BISHOP QUESTION.

A great deal of correspondence has again reached me from Roman Catholic readers of Truth, chiefly with reference to the grievance of Father Meenagh, of Clay Cross, which was dealt with last week. Mr. Wright, of The Grange, Butterley, the owner of the private oratory which has caused the trouble in this instance, writes to say that he takes exception to the accuracy of some of Father Meenagh's statements, and suggesting that I should publish his version of the story, which, of course, I am quite ready to do whenever he sends it. Another correspondent in the same neighbourhood says that it was an unduly flattering account of Mr. Wright's undertaking to say that he had built a private oratory in his grounds, and I gather from what he says that what has really been done is to convert into a chapel an apartment previously used as a hay-loft. If this is correct, the action of the Bishop of Nottingham in allowing this oratory to be opened for public services at the risk of serious injury to Father Meenagh's churches and work at Alfreton and Clay Cross becomes so much the more difficult to justify. I give below two other letters which refer to this case and to the general questions which have lately been under discussion:—

Bishop Brindle has not been a success at Nottingham, a military career being no recommendation for the mitre. I wonder how many know how the retired army chaplain came by his bishopric? The late Cardinal Vaughan wanted an auxiliary, and he had fixed on his brother, Monsignor J. Vaughan, for the post. But Father Brindle, retiring from the army with a good pension, was, on the recommendation of Lord Kitchener, considered by the Cardinal to be more eligible than Monsignor J. Vaughan. So it is to a letter to the Cardinal written by Lord Kitchener that the Catholic Church in England owes the privilege of having Bishop Brindle as one of her chief pastors.

As regards the general policy to be pursued respecting the financial scandals, it seems to me that several things have to be made clear. You say that all hopes of Rome's interference "received the coup de grâce when Cardinal Merry del Val sent to Archbishop Bourne the letter addressed to him respecting the contemplated proceedings before the Charity Commissioners." I am not so sure that Cardinal Merry del Val did send the letter directly to the Archbishop; he may have sent it to one of the other Bishops to make inquiries. It is obviously the duty of the Holy See, when a serious charge is made against a Bishop, to inquire into the truth of the charge, and to hear what the accused has to say for himself. Once the Archbishop heard that the Charity Commissioners were moving it was quite easy for him to send his solicitor to find out the cause and who was the mover. Of course, the gentleman who wrote to the Holy See at the suggestion of the Commissioners, had no official position; and so, from the beginning, ran the risk of being discovered. We have now the curious spectacle of a great Government office shirking their duty, trying to put it upon other's shoulders, quibbling over the position of their agent, and now, in self-defence, backing up the very man whose administration they were officially called upon to examine. What should the gentleman, "Mr. A.," do now? Sit down quietly under the disavowal of the Charity Commissioners? No. He should again approach them and force them to take action. "Acting on your suggestion which you have thought fit to deny I approached the Holy See unsuccessfully. We now return to the position before our last interview, and I now call upon you forthwith to begin the formal inquiry into the administration of the Catholic funds, the particulars of which I have given to you."

We have lately had an object lesson, both in the generosity of the Catholics and their justly suspicious fears. The Archbishop in January asked for £100,000 for a School Crisis Fund. He has not obtained one-tenth of the sum asked for, although certain wealthy Catholics found themselves forced, for example's sake, to make large donations. Father Bans, on the other side, a few weeks after the Archbishop had made his levy, comes out with an emergency appeal for £12,000. His institution being incorporated, Catholics knew that the money is under control. In two weeks he received more than the amount asked for. The Catholics remember that Manning put down one of his horses so as to save money for his schools, and they draw comparisons between his way of carrying on the work and that of the present Archbishop, for whom, at the present time, a £1,000 motor-car is being built, although he possesses a carriage and pair. Suppose the motor-car is a present (I do not know where the £1,000 is coming from), this is not the time to accept presents of luxuries when money for vital necessities cannot be raised.

An amusing thing is reported in the Portsmouth Evening News of March 18. The Bishop has finished his cathedral, and the congregation presented him lately with an address of congratulation. The good Portsmouth Catholics are certainly the most humorous in England. Remembering that the cathedral has been built by using the funds of the endowed missions "as a financial basis," they tell Bishop Cahill in their address: "We are deeply sensible that this [the completion of the cathedral] has been accomplished without any pecuniary assistance from us. . . . We are deeply sensible of your paternal affection towards us in completing and adorning in so beautiful a manner this house of God, etc." In his reply Bishop Cahill followed the same tone: "He thanked them, too, for their prayerful help during the carrying out of the work of cathedral extension, in respect of which he was glad to say that no pecuniary liability now remained." I understand there was a similar assurance before the famous circular, which must have been in the minds of all concerned, the addressed and addressers. While Portsmouth rejoices, what are the feelings of the endowed missions that have been deprived of some £50,000 by the use of their capital?

A matter in the diocese of Southwark needs looking into. I hear that a sum of money, given some years ago to build a presbytery at Redhill, I think, has been spent on the seminary at Wonersh. Is this so? If it be the case, the Charity Commissioners might well look into the affairs of the Wonersh Seminary.

If any one proposes to put the Bishop into Court, let him write to Propaganda to ask permission, and say if he does not get a reply within a month, he will take silence for consent. He can then proceed without any fear of excommunication.

As regards what is said above respecting the recent application to the Charity Commission, no doubt it would have been better if the applicant had insisted on the Commissioners dealing one way or the other with his original complaint, and declined to allow himself to be put off on the side issue raised by the Commissioners in regard to his communication to Cardinal Merry del Val. But as I understood his attitude, he was so disgusted at the way he had been treated that he did not care to go further—which was probably what the Commissioners hoped for. I suppose, however, that it is still open to any one interested in the administration of the Dawes Trust to take up the case with the Charity Commission where he left it. The matter is one which emphatically calls for notice in Parliament, for the attitude of the Charity Commission towards the Roman Catholic hierarchy concerned all sections of the community, irrespective of creed, and I would point out that it is not too late for some public-spirited legislator to take the question up. The following letter has an interesting bearing on the question of the desirability of applying to Rome for permission to take proceedings against Bishops in the civil courts. I may mention that in this connection I have been told that Cardinal Gotti, Prefect of Propaganda, has had many applications from the diocese of Nottingham besides that in Father Hays' case, and that he is personally strongly opposed to proceedings in the civil courts, involving public scandal to the Church, for which reason he is the more disposed to take a strong line with English Bishops who require to be kept in order:—

Your article on "Bishop Brindle and his Clergy" does not regard as very hopeful the prospect of a priest obtaining the sanction of the Holy See to take civil proceedings against a bishop. In this you are correct, and your view is substantiated by recent facts.

It must not, however, be overlooked that Propaganda, rather than permit the maladministration of a bishop to be exposed in the civil courts, have frequently been forced themselves to bring direct pressure to bear on offending prelates.

In the case of Miss Sharpe, who was successful in her slander action, the Holy See ordered Bishop Brindle to withdraw absolutely his excommunication, and (fearing the reopening of the case in the civil courts) also to pay damages for what the lady had suffered.

Some months ago Father Hays, missionary rector of Holyrood Church at Market Rasen, demanded that the Holy See should either give him justice or grant him canonical permission to seek the protection of English law. His grounds of complaint were that during his absence in New Zealand (where he was prostrate with pneumonia), Bishop Brindle took away his mission, entered his house, and broke open the locks on his private drawers and cupboards in his study, containing private documents and letters. Also that the Bishop had taken the endowments of the mission, and the payments (or stipends) for masses he had said. The first action is contrary to civil law; the second is against the Church's interpretation of the eighth commandment; and if the stipends are not restored, it is contrary to the instructions given to all confessors "de restitutione."

Nevertheless, the Roman authorities neither refused nor granted this request, but at once they themselves moved against the Bishop. Father Hays received the leave of absence for which he had asked in vain for years. His house and church at Market Rasen were fully restored to him.

The present chaotic state of the diocese of Nottingham and the unfortunate administration is one that calls for vigorous action on the part of those of the clergy who have the courage, not only to speak in defence of "Right," but also to act.

The next letter refers to an incident which has already been discussed in Truth—the closing of St. Ann's School at Gosport. The story here told of the sequel to that event, the memorial to the Holy See, the information on the subject which subsequently reached the Portsmouth diocesan authorities, and the alleged suffering of certain of the memorialists in consequence, is not very pleasant reading. The statement in the church magazine as to the letter, although registered, having been refused by the Curia as insufficiently prepaid is manifestly untrue, and it is obvious that some knowledge of the nature of the communication had made its way back from Rome to Portsmouth. The writer of the first letter printed above points out the necessity for any complaint addressed to Rome being referred back to England for inquiry as to the facts before action can be taken upon it. But, however necessary this may be, it ought to be done in such a way as to protect every individual complainant. This was clearly not done in the case of the letter to Cardinal Merry del Val, which in one way or another came into the hands of the Archbishop of Westminster, and was referred by him to the Charity Commission; nor in this case at Portsmouth. An appeal to Rome becomes an impossibility for the great majority of Catholics if it immediately results in the appellants being handed over to the tender mercies of the ecclesiastical superiors of whose action they complain:—

One of the statements of the writer in your issue of the 20th inst.—viz.: "The hope which existed at one time of the intervention from Rome in the scandals of the English Church has long since come to an end," is, curiously enough, confirmed by what has recently occurred at Gosport. The facts are: A few years since a church and school were opened at St. Ann's Hill, a suburb of Gosport. At first things went on flourishingly. The school increased until there was an average attendance of some 150 children, then quarrels arose between the head teacher and a member of the congregation on a matter not connected with the duties of the teacher. Canon Watson then had his curates removed, and tried to get rid of the teacher. Failing to do this by fair means, he proceeded to shut up the school and turned all the children out to seek their education where they could find it. This after the parents of the children had collected for the building of the school, and after the Education Authority had been to the expense of providing the requisite furniture. Objection was naturally taken to this, and letters were written to the Bishop, begging for his help to put things straight. These letters were never replied to by him. Then he was seen and appealed to, with the same result. Failing to obtain redress, where they had every reason to expect it, a number of the congregation then wrote and sent a letter to Rome, showing that out of the 150 children who had been attending the school, some 130 had had to go to non-Catholic schools. By some means the news that this letter was being prepared leaked out, and every means was taken to find out who was answerable for its preparation. It was, however, sent off, registered. Then came one of the most remarkable bits of bluff imaginable. In the church magazine (edited by Canon Watson) appeared a remarkable story of a letter having been received from one of the officials of the Curia in Rome, in which this mysterious person stated that a bulky letter had been refused by the Curia, as it was insufficiently post paid, and the article went on to suggest that perhaps it was the testimonial which a grateful congregation had sent to Rome about their priest. It would have been interesting if the article had told us how they knew in Rome what the bulky package contained if they did not take it in; and it might have gone a step farther and shown how it was possible to register and post a letter without paying the postage. Since then some of the names of signatories have been discovered, and the coal tickets of one poor person have been stopped, because there was a name similar to hers on the list. At the time that it was being signed many persons declined to sign, not because they did not approve, but for fear that it might be found out that they had signed, and they would be made to suffer for signing. That it is time to stop this reign of terror must be evident to every man with the courage of his convictions, and if letters of a confidential nature are to be sent back to the person reported, with the result that the writers are liable to suffer for their temerity in the way of being boycotted, all confidence in justice will be at an end.

A communication that I have had from another gentleman well informed on all ecclesiastical matters, though he does not write for publication, indicates that the kind of grievance under which Father Meenagh has suffered is not peculiar to the diocese of Nottingham. Two cases in Southwark diocese are mentioned which seem to justify this view. My informant states that the new church, opened a week or two since at Clapham, was set on foot without the knowledge of the Redemptionist Fathers in whose mission it is situated, and that when the fact was discovered it provoked a very outspoken protest to the Bishop (Dr. Bourne). In the same way a new mission is said to have been set on foot in the Benedictine Mission at Lordship-lane, Dulwich. The story goes that the first intimation the priest in charge had of what was on foot was conveyed by an anonymous letter, telling him that if he walked down a certain road on a certain morning he would see something that would interest him. He did so, and was rewarded by discovering the Bishop engaged in laying the foundation stone of a new church! If it is really possible for new churches to be originated in this way within the precincts of existing missions, the strongest remarks that have yet been made on the autocratic methods of English Bishops hardly do justice to the state of the case. It seems to be a common opinion that such excesses of episcopal authority are inevitable in a missionary church; but that can only be because the authorities at Rome are lamentably lacking in the exercise of the needful controlling authority, and in listening to the complaints of the aggrieved. It is difficult to understand how a missionary church can make any headway or fulfil any missionary character under such conditions.

An Eminent Physician says: "Every one in any way delicate, especially on the chest, should have a gas fire in the bedroom. Not one atom less healthy than coal."

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

The Social Catechism.

(Second Series—for the Use of Males.)

Question: Who are you?

Answer: A male animal, of the human species, endowed with a thirst for Social distinction.

Q.: What do you mean by "Social distinction"?

A.: By "Social distinction" I mean only being seen about with the best people, in the best places.

Q.: Who are the best people?

A.: The people whom I want to know and who do not want to know me.

Q.: Are you often seen about with the best people?

A.: As often as they will let me.

Q.: And in the best places?

A.: As often as I can get there.

Q.: Were you born among the best people?

A.: No; I was born in an industrial centre in the provinces. But my father made money, and I have come to London to spend it.

Q.: Then you have a father?

A.: Physically and financially, I have a father; socially, I have none.

Q.: And a mother?

A.: I have no mother.

Q.: How is that?

A.: Because my mother is impossible.

Q.: Do you know many of the best people?

A.: I know them all, and some of them know me.

Q.: When you came to London, did you bring letters of introduction to the best people?

A.: Yes; I brought the best of all letters of introduction to them.

Q.: What is that?

A.: My cheque-book.

Q.: Did the best people, then, welcome you on the strength of your cheque-book?

A.: They welcomed my cheque-book and they put up with me.

Q.: How did you make an opening for the use of your cheque-book?

A.: I had no need to make an opening. They made the opening.

Q.: How did they do that?

A.: Some played bridge with me; others made bets with me. In both cases, the use of my cheque-book followed as a matter of course.

Q.: Can you play bridge?

A.: No.

Q.: Did the best people mind that?

A.: No.

Q.: Why did they not mind it?

A.: Because they did the playing, while I did the paying.

Q.: Have you a wife?

A.: I have not a wife of my own; but I am doing my best to annex the wife of another man.

Q.: Why do you do this?

A.: Because it is expected of me to live up to my exalted surroundings.

Q.: Do all the best men in society, then, annex other men's wives?

A.: All who can afford to do so.

Q.: Is it very expensive to annex other men's wives?

A.: It is very expensive. One has to finance the wives, and frequently the husbands also.

Q.: Then would it not come cheaper to have a wife of your own?

A.: It would come much cheaper. But it would be less up-to-date.

Q.: What is morality?

A.: Morality is a fetish of second-rate persons, in which the best people, with few exceptions, have long ceased to believe.

Q.: Who are these few exceptions?

A.: Men who, from age or infirmity, are past gallantry, and women who are either too old or too ugly to attract.

Q.: Are the best people, then, never moral on principle?

A.: The best people have no principle.

THE THEATRES.

The Follies, at the Royalty.

A mixed programme was awaiting us at the Royalty Theatre on an evening of last week, and whatever might be said against the entertainment provided by Mr. Pélissier and his company, lack of variety cannot be brought forward among its failings. But I am glad to say that on this occasion I am not obliged to talk of failure, but can let myself go on the pleasant stream of praise and unreservedly advise my readers to betake themselves to the Royalty Theatre while The Follies are in possession.

The programme is divided into three main sections, and contains a great deal of humorous printed information indispensable to the playgoer between the acts. Mr. Pélissier here informs us, for instance, that it was a moot point with his family whether to have him educated or sent to Eton. The former course was adopted, as is proved by the brilliancy of the present entertainment. Mr. Pélissier is also good enough to furnish us with information as to the burial place of the Chicago branch of his family (note illustration), with a portrait of his business manager, "seen from the south," and other valuable biographical details. The programme is certainly the most amusing among the thousands that have passed through my hands in this country, and is a clever adaptation of the French system in vogue at the lighter Parisian theatres.

Returning to the actual performance, after the songs and recitations of the first part comes "Baffles," the parody of "Raffles," "A Peter Pantomime," "resented" by Mr. Showman, and coupling together these two popular successes in an inextricable farrago of amiable nonsense. Mr. Pélissier as Baffles, a music pirate, and Nana (a Tweenie), unites in his own person two important personages of our modern comedy, and it will suffice to mention that Miss Poor Lean Blumé figures in the triple personages of Peter Tanned, the boy who couldn't sit down, of a Burglar and a Pirate, to place my readers in possession of all the information they require when deciding whether to witness or to refrain from witnessing this part of the entertainment. My advice would be to dine comfortably and see as much of the clever fooling as coincided with good digestion, which, as the performance does not begin until 8.30, should be a considerable amount.

But the third part is certainly not to be missed. Here Mr. Pélissier's wit as parodist, comedian, and composer finds full scope in the "Burlesque of a Music Hall Entertainment." Frequenters of music halls will not want a second bidding to go and see "Mr. George Robeville, the Refined Humorist," and "Mr. Gush Squealin, the Costly Coster." Mr. Pélissier exceeds his own high level of entertainment as the feminine star of the music hall, and the stage of the Royalty is arranged as the stage of an East End music hall with boxes and seats occupied by the other members of the troupe, who take an active part in the entertainment. Apparent impromptu marks the contribution of these onlookers, until, as it were by accident, one finds them on the stage, making one laugh by some new device.

The whole forms an unpretentious entertainment, which should be visited by all in need of laughter.

* * * * *

At the Waldorf Theatre is being given the new musical play, "The Gipsy Girl," by Mr. Arundale. The familiar theme of a youthful heiress kidnapped and returning to her ancestral home as a member of a gipsy troupe serves as basis for this entertainment. The young Squire falls in love with her, and after many mild vicissitudes and frequent changes of garment on her part, he wins her for his own. Miss Sybil Arundale plays the gipsy with much cleverness, especially when disguised as a lad. Her dancing of the Polonaise was a bright moment; her singing was always welcome. Mr. Aubrey Fitzgerald, a genuine humorist contrived to make us laugh from time to time as the conceited aspirer to the gipsy's favours, and Mr. Cleather contributed one effective song. But the play was not quite strong enough to hold the audience, and the shoulders of Miss Sybil Arundale are hardly strong enough to bear so considerable a weight as the entertainment, on the ladies' side, of a whole evening. The performance has nothing objectionable about it, but, on the other hand, does not contain enough of interest to make it possible to recommend it.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE M. BERTHELOT.

THE French, taken as a whole, are perhaps as good as, if not better than, almost any other people. Their great men rise to a pitch of perfection rarely, if ever, equalled by those of any other nation. They have a fineness of grain that one hardly ever meets with outside France, and a high tension that one may meet in Spain, but conducive there to quixotism. Zanardelli had high-strung character with a practical mind, which would have brought him into brotherhood with Berthelot. I do not suppose you could find at Royal Society meetings a member so distinguished for exquisite scholarship, for the literary perfection of his papers, and so versed in classical literature, as the great savant who last Saturday had the honours of a national funeral under circumstances unique in the whole history of science. Berthelot could find on the spur of the moment a verse or lines of Lucretius chiming in with his philosophical thought or some train of ideas arising from a recent discovery. He was equally in his place at the Academy and at the Academy of Sciences. As a literary artist he may be ranked with Buffon. On the occasion of his College of France golden jubilee he received addresses from all the universities of the world. The great number precluded answering any one in particular. He had to speak urbi et orbi from the Sorbonne, and to be, without setting up to the character, l'homme pontife of the day and the spokesman of humanity. In being so he gave out no uncertain note. He spoke up and out, and from the depths of profound conviction, without dogmatism or intolerance. In his long, laborious, and pensive life he had learned that moral and scientific truth is to some degree relative, or at any rate liable to shift. But in relation to the short span of human life it may be held as fixed. Berthelot aimed at this "certitude" as a basis for all his theories. He spared no pains to attain it, cast to the winds personal interests, and devoted himself with the rarest singleness of mind to its pursuit. His brain became a university from the vast range of his intellectual acquirements. He detested narrow or narrowing education, predicted that the narrow specialising of young German chemists by the captains of chemical industry would be the ruin some years hence of chemistry in Germany, as technical scientific schools would be of the Swiss in the sphere of science. These schools are only good for capitalists wanting a certain supply of cheap labour.

Berthelot's discoveries have vastly enriched the world. Honours crowded upon him, but he made no money beyond the slender salaries attached to the different posts he filled, all posts involving hard work. Up to 1881, when the Senate elected him a life member, he had only the salary of a professor at the College of France. The rule, not many years ago, against the cumulation of incomes from posts under Government reduced him to his meagre income of Permanent Secretary to the Academy of Sciences, with the residential flat at the Institute, and his pay of 25 frs. a day as a Senator while the Senate was in session. There were the fees for attendance at the weekly meetings of the Academy, which he entered in 1900. This would have brought him 4,000 frs. a year had he been able to go there every week. The open-air laboratory for vegetable chemistry, at Meudon, cost the State 14,000 frs. and afforded Berthelot a country residence from May to November. But he worked there for nothing, studying the action of electricity on plants and how to create nitric acid by means of artificial electrical storms, on of course a small scale. Instinctive divination often put him on the right track. He took, he said himself, more pleasure in following tracks than a hunter could in tracing a wild animal to its lair. He rather looked on the forces of nature as wild creatures. They must have the mastery in the long run. Meanwhile it was amusing, interesting, and useful to master and turn them to our service. There could be no more methodic worker. The roomy lodging at the Institute and the laboratory buildings at Meudon afforded him space to range methodically and conveniently his vast correspondence, notes, mems, brochures, and books sent him from all parts. The bane of his life, before he went to live at the Institute, had been the heaping up of written and printed matter in great piles where they lay lost to him for ready reference. The methodic orderliness of Mme. Berthelot could not compensate for the want of space for the proper ranging of his things. One has hardly room in a Paris flat, at a reasonable rent, to keep an extra umbrella. Only the wealthy can afford to store up papers in boxes or pigeon-holes and books in cases.

Berthelot took his appearance and his extraordinary activity from his mother, a native of Lower Burgundy, and "a true daughter," as he said, "of Gaul," coming, as she did, from the locality of Alise Sainte Reine, the site of the great Gallic city of Alesia, where Vercingetorix played his last card against Cæsar. In the spirit of her far-back foremothers, she instinctively put her shoulder to the wheel. Her courage rose, as did theirs, when she had to face a difficulty. This kept her young through old age. She dated from the last year of the eighteenth century, married at the age of twenty-six, witnessed three foreign invasions and all the dynastic changes and revolutions between 1814 and 1871, talked about them as she knit stockings, and never ceased to hope for the good time coming. She lived long enough to see her son rank among the illustrious Frenchmen of his time. He inherited her longevity—for she died at the age of seventy-eight—but not her optimism. His activity kept the pessimism he took from the other side of the house under. He passed his childhood and youth in the house to which his father, a doctor with a fair local practice, brought her home a bride, in the dark, narrow Rue du Mouton. Baron Haussmann cleared away this street to make way for the Avenue Victoria. The rooms looking on the street were chilly and gloomy. A large room facing the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville was bright and spacious. Without stirring from it, the inmates could see all the revolutionary drama of which the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville was the theatre in 1830 and 1848. It was waken-ing to a young mind, and deconventionalising. Berthelot, who had instinctive courage and combativeness, could not understand Taine running to some hole in the country whenever there was powder in the air. Taine lay by at Orsay all the time of the Commune. As a historian, he ought to have been in Paris and in the thick of the excitement. Had Berthelot had to write a history of the Revolution and its origines, he would not have lost this opportunity to study revolutionists, and the proximate causes for their being so. Dr. Berthelot, on leaving the Rue de Mouton, went to Neuilly, where he bought a practice. He and his widow died and were buried there, and their son arranged to lie beside them in the grave. The children have, however, accepted a mausoleum niche in the vaults of the Panthéon, on condition that the remains of Mme. Berthelot be placed there too. As a feminist, M. Briand readily consented, and all the more easily for the Westminster Abbey precedent in favour of the late Mrs. W. E. Gladstone.

Events take a spontaneously dramatic character in Paris, and with the suddenness of a flash of lightning. They "éclaterent." You have none of this in London, Berlin, or the other great capitals. A week ago I had occasion to mention the attempts of novelists and dramatic authors to minimise the marriage tie to nothing. This week the world has learned that M. Berthelot died from grief at losing his wife a few minutes after her death. When her recovery could be no longer hoped for he told his sons that he could not possibly survive her. She suffered from a painful heart disease. He, knowing how painful darkness and the sense of being alone is to a person with her malady, sat up at nights beside her to cheer her up a little when a nervous action of the heart gave her a painful start. He kept the room lighted, but screened the light. When it was day he went to rest on the couch in his study, which served as a shakedown for relatives from Lille. The patience he had acquired in his scientific searches for truth made him invaluable, with his sensibility and tenderness, as a nurse. This man of hard facts brimmed over with sentiment. I do not say that his cry of "Je n'en peux plus," as he turned away from her lifeless, will live through the ages. But it deserves to do so. His renown, the funeral honours given to him and her, and the celebrity now attached to both of their names must make the anti-marriage authors back engines. The tomb of M. and Mme. Berthelot gives the Panthéon the sentimental interest that it wanted.

Nobody could be more keenly alive than Berthelot to the great note of interrogation that a funeral solemnity forces on the mind. He kept it out of sight as much as he could, so that it should not slacken his activity. Life at best—and he had the best it could give—seemed to him a sad affair with the certain prospect of a wind-up at the end in bankruptcy. His wife had a mild, patient disposition, disciplined by education, experience, and naturally unselfish. She had a peculiarly sweet and beaming presence that was really a feast to the eyes. She kept off the sadness of advancing years by having round her her grandchildren and by busying herself with their little affairs, and in Dorcas works of charity. Mme. Berthelot belonged to a family of Swiss origin—the Bréguets—who had as watchmakers a great name in the reign of Louis Philippe. They and the family of M. Léon Bourgeois were in close friendship as Paris watchmakers.

If the Senate do not change at nurse the income-tax scheme of M. Caillaux, or reject it altogether, we may expect to see the prospects of the exiled Pretenders brighten. This scheme is another instance of the betrayal with a kiss. The excuse for it is that it is intended to throw the burden of taxation on the great fortunes. If it did, M. Caillaux would not have devised it. He belongs to the northern part of the Sarthe, where it runs into Normandy, and to the Christophle—De Marcère politico-financial group. His scheme will bear heaviest on the struggling bourgeoisie that can barely make both ends meet, and on that grade of the working class which is above the from-hand-to-mouth level. Nothing in the way of a fiscal blister has approached it since the abolition of the gabelle of hateful memory. The great splitting up of fortunes in France must place any income tax on an unbearable footing. M. Caillaux, being rich, can afford to laugh at the discontent of the petty bourgeoisie and upper-class working people. He thinks, I hear, that they will squeal in vain, since they are not the people to cast bombs or to throw up barricades. This is true. But they are, and have been always, the people who goad on the poor wretches. They did so in 1830, in 1848, on the Fourth of September, and will do so again if they are squeezed according to the Caillaux plan. If the enormously wealthy people did not see in his scheme something analogous to the approaches in siege tactics they would have good reason to be satisfied. There will be only a tax of 4 per cent. on incomes above 100,000 fr. a year. What is this to a Porges, a Sommier, a Casimir-Perier, a Rothschild, a Schneider, a Creuzot, and many other industrial and banking kings?

The curiosities of the scheme would be amusing were they not certain to draw tears. So far from contributing to family unity, as M. Caillaux imagines, it must utterly disperse it. A wife's income will be totalised with that of her husband, though her marriage contract secures her separation in regard to money matters. If he has as clerk, counter-assistant, or officer 5,000 frs. a year, the totalised income of 10,000 frs. will be liable to the two taxes—générale et complémentaire —that is to say to 10 per cent.; a big hole that will be severely felt in New Year's week. Were these taxpayers living according to the system of "l'union libre" they would be spared the tax complémentaire. We may therefore expect free unions to increase in respectable spheres. As yet they are confined to the working classes.

A theatrical star will only be taxed according to the salary entered in her manager's account-book, though she may notoriously refuse to accept bouquets containing fewer than five hundred-franc bank-notes, or even less than a thousand-franc note. Mme. Bob Walther, in her suit against her husband to recover from him the custody of their daughter, started giving the names of those actresses of a celebrated theatre who insisted on Flora being thus made subservient to the mercantile Cytheris. Her point was that the husband brought the child—a girl entering her teens—into the wings of this theatre. I really do not see why the State, which lends itself to the destruction of the population by the sale of spirits, should not tax those bouquets containing bank-notes and visiting-cards.

Clemenceau does not set up to be a financier. I fancy that he trusts to the Senate to render the Caillaux scheme bearable. The Senate is now the citadel of the Republic and the stronghold of good sense. The great angle of vantage of the Finance Minister is his having served in the same capacity in the Waldeck-Rousseau Government. This is why the actual Premier offered him the post when M. Poincaré declined to take it, though much pressed and offered a free hand.

A PEER ON THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

I REALLY do think you have made a great mistake in not using that article I wrote for you about the Suffragettes. I thought when I wrote it, and I do now, that it was quite one of the best I have written for you—and so does Jessie. In fact, she is quite annoyed about it, and says she does not think you can be much of an editor if you are not a better judge of an article than that shows you to be. I do not go so far as that myself, but I really do think you are making a great mistake, and it is only fair to tell you so. It would have been convenient for me, this week, as it happens, too, because I have found it uncommonly hard to find anything else worth writing about. However, Jessie thinks the Channel Tunnel would do, so I have written this one about it. I am not quite sure myself whether the Government was right to jump upon it. Being a Radical Government makes me feel a little doubtful; especially when I do not see that it makes any difference—because I am quite sure it never would have been bored anyhow. My brother-in-law, who ought to know, says he does not believe there are enough people so unselfish as to like burying their money in a deep hole at the bottom of the sea merely to save a few other people from being sea-sick for half-an-hour or so, once a year. He says that money talks, whatever that means, and that when all the soldiers and patriots and journalists and axe-grinders have finished discussing it, the capitalists would settle it. And when he thought about the millions it would cost to build, and the big fares that would have to be charged, and the competition from Channel Ferries, and improved steamboats, and all the rest of it, he said that he would as soon put all his money on a Lincolnshire favourite as in any Channel Tunnel Company. And he knows what he is talking about.

(Jessie says I am very silly to tell you, but I think you might be able to guess, from the style or something, that I did not write the rest of the article myself. The truth of it was that I could not find anything more to say, so I spoke to a man I know slightly, and he said he had an article about it that he had offered to every paper in England, and not one of them would look at it. He offered to make me a present of it, just for the pleasure he would get from seeing it in print. I do not think it half bad, myself, though I cannot say much for the style it is written in, so if you take my advice you will use it. But mind you do not forget to scratch out this part between the brackets.)

I was at a dinner party the day before yesterday.

One of the guests was a Volunteer colonel, and another was a newspaper editor. Hence it came naturally about that Art and Literature—the two subjects in which I am most qualified to shine as a conversationalist—were never so much as mentioned either before, during, or after the meal. Even the Suffragettes were totally neglected. Nothing was, in fact, discussed but the Channel Tunnel and the Government's action with regard to it. Opinions were, of course, divided. The Volunteer colonel took what is, I understand, the orthodox military view that, had the tunnel once been built, the Kaiser would have immediately declared war upon France; would have marched from victory to victory, and so to the French end of the tunnel; would have despatched through it, in excursion trains and disguised as German waiters, an enormous army of uhlans; would have surprised our slumbering sentinels, seized and fortified Dover, and within a few days would have been marching up Ludgate Hill at the head of his guards to celebrate a victorious "Te Deum" in St. Paul's Cathedral. The colonel was supported by our hostess, who is a lady of strong views, and who considered that the boring of the Channel would have had a prejudicial effect upon the morality of the South Coast, that Brighton would become a second Ostend, and that Eastbourne would rival Monte Carlo, with Beachy Head as the site for a monster casino. The editor on the other hand—but at this rate I shall never get to what I am really trying to write about.

I should have hesitated to introduce these incidents of private life into a newspaper article had it not been that to them I owe my realisation of the fact that the real interest of the Channel Tunnel proposals lies in the past rather than in the future. I do not think personally, that it ever will be bored, but I do firmly believe that it provides us with quite illuminating insight into the things our ancestors used to discuss at their dinner-tables thousands and thousands of years ago. And as this realisation came to me in what I suppose to have been a vision while I was still sitting at the dinner-table, I am tempted to set forth that vision exactly as it came to me. It lasted an astonishingly short time; the editor when I awoke—if that be the proper word—had not yet finished the sentence—it had something to do with the benefits to be expected from greater opportunities of mutual intercourse among the nations, I think—upon which he was already embarked when I fell asleep, so to put it.

It seemed to me that I was at a dinner-party, in an island which I believed to be England, very many thousands of years ago. We were sitting in a cave, round a stone table; we were cutting up our meat—it was raw—with stone knives, and our costume was of skins and scanty. The most remarkable part of the vision was, perhaps, that we were exactly the same party. Our hostess, I remember—though I should not like her to know it—had her face tattooed in a curious zig-zag pattern, and wore a large bone nose-ring, which did not prevent her from looking extremely distinguished. The teeth of the Volunteer colonel were filed to sharp points, giving him a very martial air; the editor's skin was dyed a curious yellow colour, and he wore several scalps at his girdle.

At the commencement of my vision the colonel was talking angrily, voicing, as he declared, the unanimous opinion of every warrior of the tribe. By close attention—wishing meanwhile that he would not brandish his bone knife quite so close to my face—I was able to make out the gist of his remarks. It appeared that some inventive genius had recently discovered that by tying the trunks of several large trees together it was possible to make boats very much larger and more stable than any hitherto known, and, with the help of skins stretched upon sticks, to direct their course, even out of sight of land. His invention perfected, he had proposed to cross the straits—across which land was clearly visible in fine weather, though hitherto, of course, impossible of access—and enter into communication with the natives, if any, of the opposite shore.

This proposal had aroused a storm of controversy in which the whole tribe took part. The originator had been promptly brained, and, I believe, eaten, by a prominent warrior, as a dangerous revolutionary and probable anti-Druidist; but his doctrines had found many upholders, and it was upon them that the colonel—the vision-colonel, I mean—was animadverting. His most cogent argument was that were these cross-Channel water-chariots, as he termed them, introduced, the natives of the further shore would infallibly invade us in overwhelming numbers, and would, in a few days, convert us all into one general barbecue. The hostess supported him—on moral grounds declaring, though I know not on what authority, that the said foreigners were of low moral tone, preferring, for instance, to cover their bodies with blue paint instead of wearing a seemly costume of skins or seaweed. Others, on the other hand, maintained that our degree of civilisation, admittedly high though it were, could but be heightened by added intercourse with sister tribes; that the progress of the world must not be checked by the invocation of worn-out military shibboleths; that, as to invasion, one jolly ancient Briton could lick half-a-dozen skinny foreigners; and so on and so forth. What conclusion was come to in the end I cannot say, for the discussion was interrupted by the Volunteer colonel—the visionary one, of course—who in a moment of anger unexpectedly fastened his teeth into the shoulder of the journalist. This latter happened to be a distant relation of our hostess, who very properly and promptly brained the aggressor with a convenient rock. The incident seemed likely to break up the party, but at that moment my vision ended.

I do not, of course, attempt to make out that my vision had any particular significance—had it been meant for the guidance of the nation at large it would scarcely have been vouchsafed to so insignificant a person as myself, especially when the Government had already made up its mind about it. Nor do I endeavour to reconcile it with atavism, or any other of the fashionable "isms," because I know very little about them. But, as a matter of personal opinion, to be taken for what it is worth, I am inclined to think that it may throw some light upon the doctrine of the transmigration of souls—that very likely, in some past existences, I have assisted at many previous discussions on proposed Channel Tunnels or their contemporary prototypes, and that in centuries to come I may again, and yet again, listen to other similar discussions concerning the same proposals. The moral of which would seem to be—or so I suppose—that talking never makes much difference to the march of events, but that we all go on talking just the same as if it did.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Middle-class, dear Lady Betty, is the backbone of this community; the backbone, however, has recently shifted to the front—a circumstance which is materially affecting the whole system. The New Anatomy involves, obviously, the moving forwards of the social organs connected with the Middle-class backbone, and the displacement of those which formerly were at the front. Our Governing class is prepared to accept the accomplished change, but is endeavouring to prevent the further necessary alterations; a treatment which must have serious consequences.

* * * * *

A political Party insists that we should "Think Imperially"; it is a symptom of our condition that no Englishman or woman has as yet appealed to us to have an Imperial Conscience.

* * * * *

This is the Age of Abbreviations; we reduce not only our words, but our principles, restraints, and work. Out of that reflection arises one of serious importance—is machinery to become the master of man? Every year more mechanical appliances are being constructed which enable man to produce easily, rapidly, and cheaply, commodities of all kinds. The increase of those commodities adds to the general prosperity, and to the condition of comfort that has to be maintained, and these improved circumstances necessitate additional production. As it is, we find ourselves compelled to sacrifice much comfort, quiet, and even security, to attain greater speed of movement. Still, the mechanical output and the generally improved conditions it causes increase. It is obvious that the time approaches when man shall not be able to add to his exertions. Is the general condition of comfort then to collapse? The contention is that the circumstances he is developing are binding man to the machinery; that the more the former improve and the latter increases the quicker and the harder he will be compelled to work, until, at length, he sinks exhausted, and the whole system collapses! Is it a new Frankenstein's Monster this mechanical development?

There is a characteristic story of an American woman —formerly well known in London—that will bear repeating. The lady is said to have written the following letter to a Royal personage:—

"Sir,—My medical attendants have just informed me that I am in a hopeless condition. I should die happy did I know that you would be represented at my funeral. I enclose a cheque for £1,000 to cover all expenses."

Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

As has so often happened before, the Lincolnshire Handicap was won neither by the best horse in the field nor by the most favourably weighted of the starters. Ob, who won with extreme ease, had certainly been harshly treated by the handicapper, and he was indebted for his victory simply to the fact that he was really well trained, and, indeed, he was actually about the only thoroughly fit horse which ran. The result was a tragical crash for backers, as Ob's name had scarcely ever appeared in the betting, while on the day of the race he drifted out to 25 to 1, and any one desirous of backing him for a small sum would have found no difficulty in obtaining 33 to 1. The early backers were not likely to back Ob, inasmuch as M. Ephrussi had a second candidate in Champ d'Or. The fact is that at one time the odds were considerable against Ob ever running at Lincoln, as he was on the point of being sold to a Belgian breeder. M. Ephrussi is said to have backed the horse for £500 at 20 to 1, which was the same bet that he had last year. Ob was trained for this race in the forest rides at Compeigne. If the race could be run over again two months hence, I do not believe that Ob would finish in the first three, and no sensible person will regard the running as correct form. Writing a fortnight ago about this race, I expressed an opinion in favour of the best from Chaloner's stable—Kaffir Chief or Cyclops Too. They are moderate horses, and Kaffir Chief was by no means favourably handicapped, but I had heard that they were fairly well forward in condition, and were believed to be in good form. Kaffir Chief finished second, and if Ob had been out of the way he would have won in a canter. It seems to me to be utter drivel to eulogise Kaffir Chief's running in the Cambridgeshire as if it had been a highly creditable performance. Polymelus was giving him two stone, and could certainly have given him another stone. Kaffir Chief only finished a neck in front of Malua, who was giving him 18 lb. and a year! This was truly abject form. At Lincoln, Kaffir Chief really represented Polymelus with about 10 st. 8 lb. on his back. As Ob was palpably fit to run, while the whole of his opponents were more or less backward, it is amazing that he was not well backed at the finish. The gullibility of the speculating public is only to be equalled by their calf-headed imbecility, and Ob was entirely neglected, while money was piled so freely on His Eminence that he finally started at the crack-brained price of 9 to 4. On the day of a big race a reproduction of the always instructive story of Panurge's sheep is usually witnessed in the ring. Let any horse be supported freely, and every distracted backer hastens to invest money on the animal. It was not stable money which brought His Eminence up in the betting, nor was it the investments of clever backers who are well inspired from Newmarket. There were considerable sums of covering money from the Continental lists to be put on Lord Howard de Walden's horse, and when it was seen that His Eminence was really in brisk demand there was a general rush to back him. His Eminence ran miserably, being quite done with more than a quarter of a mile from home. I have always thought that the Epsom course would suit this horse better than the flat mile at Lincoln, and he will be in much better racing condition on April 24; but His Eminence has of late been decidedly overrated by his admirers, who, moreover, have overlooked the fact that he has a bad temper, for in many of his recent gallops at Newmarket he has turned sulky, and has most obviously refused to exert himself. A wet and stormy day, such as was experienced at Lincoln on Tuesday, is quite likely to upset such a horse. Camisard, who carried a great deal of public money, was tolerably fit, but he ran untried. If this horse had been galloped the result would have shown that he had no chance at Lincoln, and the friends of Ob were convinced that their steed would find no difficulty in giving nearly 2 st. to the Newmarket horse. The fact that Rifleite finished third was an immense benefit for the numerous bookmakers who were betting 1, 2, 3, but I fancy that Athi could have gained this place if he had been ridden out.

Ob had the race safely in hand some distance from home, and I do not suppose that any horse was ridden out hard unless express instructions had been given to the jockey to try for a place. Minos was out of the race from the start, as he whipped round, but Mr. Rothschild's horse had really no chance of winning, for he is exceedingly moderate. Minos has dreadful forelegs, and it will be well to get a race out of him before the ground gets hard, but it will require clever placing to bring him in a winner. Bill of the Play, who was well backed at the finish, was the most fit of the English horses. He delayed the start for a long time by his exasperating antics, and his caperings caused some others in the field to behave badly. He must have utterly destroyed any chance which he might originally have possessed. Velocity was so ridiculously backward that he might as well have remained at home, and the same may be observed of Roseate Dawn. Crusader's chance was blighted by the delay at the post, and that this horse's running was all wrong was proved by the fact that he finished a long way behind his despised stable companion, Truffle de Périgord. Dumbarton Castle, who had no price in the betting, ran prominently for a long way, and his performance was the more creditable, inasmuch as it was said that he had been badly kicked while at the post by Bill of the Play. Sir John Thursby's horse had not been seen out since he was unplaced in the Wokingham Handicap at Ascot, and his last appearance previously was in the Royal Handicap at the Epsom Summer Meeting, when he started favourite, but finished nowhere. It is funny to remember that Gingal and Bill of the Play were the favourites for last year's Two Thousand when the flag fell, and Sir John Thursby's colt was backed for that race by pretty near every "sharp" on Newmarket Heath. Lovania, who was a great fancy at Newmarket, ran very badly, and is not likely to be heard of again in connection with a race of this description. She is deficient in stamina. The heavily backed Crescent ran best of the horses which were favourites at the finish, but his supporters were grievously disappointed by his failure to gain the place for which he had been well backed. Kaffir Chief went out to 100 to 7 towards the last for lack of support, every one being perfectly infatuated about His Eminence and Bill of the Play, and there was no difficulty in getting proportionate odds for a place. Fra Diavolo, who carried a great deal of money, was scratched in consequence of his having met with an accident, but his presence in the field would not have altered the result, if it is true that he was not nearly fit.

There were large fields for most of the events at Lincoln, but the majority of the starters were preposterously backward, and the early form will no doubt be knocked all to pieces before the season is far advanced.

The Brocklesby Stakes brought out a field of eighteen, and practically all the money went on two animals trained at Newmarket—Lord Harewood's Malwood, and Mr. L. de Rothschild's Pastry. Mr. Larnach's Seance, who had been well tried, was quietly backed for a good deal of money. The run on Malwood surprised those who had heard that he had failed to give satisfaction in a trial. Pastry was the great tip, as she had been well galloped, and she was said to be in front of her stable companion Selaginella, who had defeated a large field for the Lincoln Cup on Tuesday. Pastry could only finish second to Counterfeit, gelding by Bill of Portland out of Cup of Assay, who is owned by Sir John Thursby. This animal has been entered for forty-three races, his next engagement being the Rendlesham Plate at Kempton Park next Monday, where he will have only 4 lb. extra to carry. Counterfeit, who was bred by Lord Crewe, is entered for races at Croxton Park and at Newbury, but he will probably be kept for the Fitzwilliam Stakes on the first day of the Newmarket Craven Meeting.

Succour was reported from Newmarket to be far and away the fittest of the three Liverpool Cup horses, and to be now in excellent form, but he ran very badly indeed, and appeared unable to stay the course. His collapse was truly ignominious, for there was not a particle of excuse for him. I much regret having been induced to depart from my original opinion as to this handicap, which was that Bridge of Canny would win, as he was obviously the pick of the lot, being a horse of decidedly superior class. I was informed, however, that Bridge of Canny would not be quite fit last week, but he came to the post much more forward in condition than had been expected, being, however, still capable of improvement. Lord Derby's horse, who has done well during the winter, won very easily indeed, and it was altogether an excellent performance. I do not suppose we shall see Bridge of Canny out again before Ascot, where he is engaged both in the Triennial and the Gold Cup. He has incurred a penalty of 10 lb. for the Vase, so it may not be thought worth while to enter him for that race.

Mr. James's colt, Attraction, who was said to be one of the best tried of the early two-year-olds at Newmarket, was heavily backed for the Molyneux Stakes, although the defeat of his stable companion, Seance, in the Brocklesby Stakes might have warned his friends not to be over sanguine. Attraction got off in front, but he is not apparently endowed with much stamina, and he ran green when collared. However, we shall see how this colt gets on at Kempton Park next Monday if he meets Counterfeit with 4 lb. the best of the weights. Mr. James may decide to keep Attraction for his engagement at Croxton Park on Thursday. The Westminster Plate at the Epsom Spring Meeting is the race which would best suit this colt. Pom, who won the Molyneux Stakes, was bred by his owner, Mr. W. H. Walker. He is own brother to Fairy Footstep, being by Count Schomberg out of Puffball, and was quite fit to run, although he may still be made considerably better than he was on Thursday. Pom, who is doubtless a better animal than either of the Lincoln winners, is next engaged in the Fitzwilliam Stakes at Newmarket, where he will probably meet Counterfeit, after which he has nothing until Salisbury. He is entered for the Woodcote Stakes at the Epsom Summer Meeting.

Glacis and Freeborn were the favourites for the Union Jack Stakes, but neither of them had a chance with Auber, who won very easily from Prince of Orange. Auber was sold at Newmarket in December to Mr. J. F. Farquharson for 2,000 gs. This animal has done well during the winter, and he was quite fit to run. Sir Edgar Vincent must regret having sold Auber, as the race which he won on Thursday was worth upwards of £1,000, and he has some other promising engagements. Freeborn hopelessly failed to stay the course, and he need not be thought of again seriously for any race of over six or seven furlongs.

A new race for three-year-olds, maidens at the time of entry, is the Red Rose Stakes of £1,000 at the Manchester Whitsuntide Meeting, and it has obtained fifty-five entries, the list being headed by his Majesty's Slim Lad and Isograph, the latter being a dark filly by Isinglass out of Amphora that is expected to prove useful next season. Among the notable animals in this race are Mr. A. Barley's All Black, Major Loder's Adora and Baltinglass, Mr. A. James's Sixty, and Mr. Fairie's Jovial.

There are no fewer than ninety-four entries for the Rous Plate of £500 at the Doncaster September Meeting, and the whole of the sum with which this race is nominally endowed will be got back by the entrances. It certainly seems to me that the Stewards of the Jockey Club ought to insist upon the value of this race being doubled, and the minor forfeit in the Champagne Stakes should in future go to the winner, instead of being rapaciously grabbed for the fund. Last year the minor forfeits amounted to £335! As to the Rous Plate of £500, this race last year cost the fund nothing, as the entrances amounted to £562! In 1905 the Champagne Stakes entrances amounted to £350, while the Rous Plate cost the fund £69.

There were twenty-three starters for the Grand National, and a worse field never went to the post for that race. The fact is that at the present time there is not one really good steeplechaser in training, but Eremon may turn out to be one of the highest class. The poor class of the starters was proved by the fact that only eight horses completed the course, falls taking place at nearly every fence. Ascetic's Silver was the best-looking horse in the field, but he was not altogether liked by some of the critics who inspected him before he left the paddock. He was soon out of the race, although he did manage to finish sixth. Timothy Titus, who fell, was not liked before the race, as he appeared jaded and overdone. Rathvale, who also fell, caused much mischief by going on without a jockey, and at every fence he was a terror to the riders of the other horses, two of which were brought down by him, and Eremon had a narrow escape. Red Lad, who started a decided favourite "for money," fell at the Canal fence, the second time of going over it. Eremon won in a common canter, after having made the whole of the running. This horse, who was bred in Tipperary by Mr. J. Cleary in 1900, is a son of Thurles, and in early life he was in the shafts of a jaunting car. He passed into the hands of Mr. James Daly, who sold him for £50 to Mr. Stanley Howard, who sent him to Coulthwaite to be trained. The result was thoroughly satisfactory, as the owner of Eremon does not bet, but races for sport alone. It is seldom that a horse of only seven years old wins at Aintree. Since 1879 the Grand National has been won twenty times by aged horses, the youngest winner having been Empress (1880), who was five years old. Thurles, the sire of Eremon, himself won some cross-country events, and he has got some excellent hunting stock in Ireland. Eremon is a beautiful jumper, his fencing being absolutely faultless, and his victory was the more creditable inasmuch as Newey, who rode him, broke a leather and lost a stirrup early in the race.

I gave a plumper last week for St. Elf for the Sefton Park Plate, and Mr. Wallace's handsome colt won easily from twelve opponents. St. Elf had been highly tried at Newmarket, and he is probably the best two-year-old which ran last week. He is a half-brother, by St. Maclou, to Gnome, who himself made a successful début at Liverpool last year. His next engagement is the Newmarket Plate at the First Spring Meeting, and he is entered for one of the principal two-year-old races at the Second Spring Meeting. He is in the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom. St. Elf is the first of the stock of St. Maclou that has won a race. This horse, who is a son of St. Simon, is now in Germany.

Beattie was made a great favourite for the Bickerstaffe Stakes, but many of the clever people backed Knight of Tully, who had missed his more valuable engagement on Thursday in order that he might be kept fresh for this race. Maya, who was not much fancied, won easily. Mr. Wyndham's filly is a mere pony, but she is very game, and she stays well.

There will be flat-racing next week at Kempton Park, Birmingham, Newcastle, Windsor, Catterick Bridge, Croxton Park, and Alexandra Park, besides upwards of twenty steeplechase meetings. The best sport will be at Kempton Park and at Newcastle, where there is not likely to be much racing of any general interest before Newmarket.

A number of events close next Tuesday, including the Great Northern Handicap of £700 at York (run May 28), and the Northumberland Plate of £1,000 at Newcastle (run June 26). There is also the Futurity Stakes of £800, with £1,000 added besides, at Baden-Baden (to run August 27), for two-year-olds, distance six furlongs. The minor forfeit (due July 23) is £5, and the conditions as to penalties are very fair. This race ought to receive a large number of English entries.

THE TRICKS OF THE C.T.C.

Last week I said I should show how difficult it is for members of the Cyclists' Touring Club to organise and what unfair means the council adopt to gull the members to support them. Members should remember that in 1906 there were 2,550 members who did not renew their ordinary subscriptions, while the decrease in new subscriptions was 770. Intending members will realise that they are invited to join a dwindling club. Let them appreciate how the officials treat the members. Last week Mr. Symons, the hon. secretary of the Reform Committee, summoned the club's chief clerk, Mr. Cladish, for assault committed at the general meeting of the club. He asked for an apology. The magistrate suggested it was a case for apology. Mr. Cladish, represented by counsel, declined to give one. Mr. Beatty, the vice-chairman of the council, was sitting by defendant's counsel. Mr. Shipton, the secretary-cum-editor, was in court. It is absurd to pretend that they did not approve of the defendant's defiance. He was fined and ordered to pay two guineas costs. Such conduct is what might be expected to meet with the approval of Mr. Shipton. He has a profound contempt for the cyclists out of whose 5s. a year he gets his living. He can afford to be a motorist now. Wherefore, he writes in the journal contemptuously of those who do "the donkey-work" needed for the propulsion of the machine. I wonder how long the long-enduring spirit of that animal will continue to animate the majority of the members of the club. If they wish the club well, they will clear out the present jacks in office—for after their behaviour at the Westminster Police-court they deserve no better term—lock, stock, and barrel.

Now the difficulties of organisation amongst the members arise from the fact that no list of members is published and that the council use the machinery of the club to support their own policy and burke discussion in the columns of the Gazette. The council refuses to publish a list of members on the petty ground that cycle agents might pester them with circulars. This is twaddle. The names and addresses of new members are published weekly, and touts can get the names there. The object is obviously to keep the members apart. Further, members are refused access to the list except by the personal leave of the secretary, and then they are not allowed to take copies. I give an instance. On February 13, 1907, a member of the Reform Committee went to the office to search the register in order to get the names to canvass for the general meeting in the South London and Brighton district. He was refused access to the register. He was not told that he must get the secretary's leave. He was told that the assistant secretary—who, by the way, is Mr. Shipton's brother—refused inspection. Apparently Mr. Shipton realised that even he can go too far. He gave himself away, however, in his letter, which was to the effect that the assistants had no authority to give leave, but the register was open at all reasonable hours for inspection, though "I cannot, of course, afford facilities for taking a copy." It is a piece of impertinence to say that the roll is open at all reasonable hours when the presence of the great panjandrum himself at the office and his gracious permission are needed.

Now let us see how the Council uses its machinery in order to work the oracle in its favour. The way in which it faked up its case in order to be able to present the petition to the Court to admit motorists aptly illustrates the methods of the Council. In March, 1906, the motion for enlargement was debated at the general meeting in London. The votes were thirty-eight for, thirty-five against, out of a total membership of some 30,000 members. The fare-paid councillors were in the majority. Thereupon the postal vote was taken. In the notice paper not one word was said that the object of the alteration was to admit motorists, nor was a hint given that it was a matter of notoriety that motor-cars had to a great extent destroyed the pleasures of cycling and increased the risk of accident in the use of bicycles. But this was what Mr. Kendall Barnett, the chairman of the Council, solemnly swore in his affidavit in support of the petition to the High Court. Having successfully concealed from the members that the object of the petition was to give the benefit of the club's assets to those who were ruining cycling, they secured a postal vote of 10,433 in favour of the change and 2,214 against. Barely one-third of the total members of the club voted. Then there had to be a general meeting. In the ordinary course London would have been selected. But a three-fourths majority was needed, and it was shifted to Newcastle. No one believes that this was to give the provinces a chance. Mr. Kendall Barnett swore it was selected as a populous district. He concealed from the Court the fact that this town is in a division of the club containing fewer members than any other division in England. Of course, it did not matter to the councillors where they went. The faithful gang has its fares paid. There were only eighty-three persons present, and the Council triumphed by seventy-seven votes to one. Meanwhile every effort had been made to suppress the opposition. In March, 1906, the Gazette had published a strong article by Mr. Kendall Barnett, written at the request of the Council in favour of the change. In April there was a strong editorial to the same effect. The postal vote was in April, and voters had to be won at all cost. Therefore a communication from the Hon. Gilbert Coleridge against the change was suppressed. The Council had coolly resolved that only their chairman's and their editor-cum-secretary's effusions should appear. How on earth was organisation possible? A more scandalous abuse of power it is impossible to conceive. Having secured the postal vote, the next move was to get a big majority in London to support the change in the rules. This would impress the Court, although only a bare majority was needed at the confirmatory meeting. Wherefore Mr. Shipton issued 2,000 reminders in the form of a postcard, which were sent out to members residing near London. Mr. Shipton swears the object was to get a quorum of ten members. He knew the Council would form a quorum. Here was a gross waste, but somehow or other Mr. Cladish, of police-court fame, managed to send practically none of these cards to members who by their postal vote had voted against the extension of the club's membership. He admits he only sent cards to those who had voted by post. After all these tricks with the Council vote there were only 173 for the change against 150. And yet the rotten petition was persisted in.

I have shown that by non-publication of the list of members, by refusal of access to the list, by jockeying meetings, by deliberately burking discussion, by using the list of voters to secure supporters who can but be ignorant of the tricks to which it resorts, the Council presents every opposition to, and has every advantage against, those who consider that men who behave in this way are not to be trusted with the affairs of a club whose income from subscriptions, advertisements, and investments is in round figures £10,000 a year.

The South will not be seen in the final of the Association Cup tie at the Palace. Lancashire and Yorkshire, Everton and Sheffield Wednesday, will give battle, and Everton, the holders, will probably win. The Arsenal were badly beaten by the Wednesday team. West Bromwich made a great fight against the holders.

After the performances of Lovejoy and Reece last week, the Billiard Association will probably consider that the anchor stroke should be barred.

Cambridge received a bad beating by Oxford in the sports. It was well deserved. The team was about as bad a one as I have ever seen, with very few individual exceptions. There was the brilliant hurdling of Powell, who equalled record for the hurdles, with Hussey, the Oxford man, only a foot behind him. The hammer-men and weight-putters were good. But of the rest, the least said sooner mended. MacLeod ought to have won the sprint, but he could not stay the distance. The jumpers and quarter-milers were not up to College form. The mile and half-mile lacked style and finish, and flapped their arms and hands about badly. In these two events Oxford were not much better. Their second strings ran admirably and fairly killed the Cambridge men by making them sprint too soon. Young's jumping was excellent, and so was the hammer-throwing. Mr. Cecil Rhodes was responsible for these events and the weight as well. The twin brothers Chevasse sprinted well and should improve a lot. But, considering the admirable state of the track, the absence of wind, and the warm, fine day, the times in both the hundred and quarter were disappointing.

St. Paul's won the public school gymnastic competition at Aldershot. I hope these schools will at once adopt the Swedish drill and exercises that are to be used in the Army. Then the physique of the boys of all conditions will improve, and the cricket, football, and boats, where there is a river, will reap the benefit. The same school won both the heavy and middle weights, while the feather-weight went to Bedford Grammar School and the light-weight to Charterhouse.

Evidence of the growing popularity of golf is to be seen in the holiday arrangements of the railway companies. Here, for instance, is an announcement of the Great Northern that, for the convenience of golfers desiring to spend Easter at links within easy distance of town a special express is being run to-morrow (Thursday) evening to Sheringham, West Runton, and Cromer, and a return express on Tuesday morning. To many men this will be a great advantage, more especially as the extended week-end tickets for Easter will be available by these expresses.

Apprehensive Stock Markets—More Failures Feared—The Rise in the French Bank Rate—Consols and Sinking Fund Purchases.

THE past week has not been a happy time for the Stock Exchange; indeed, about the only comfort members can derive from it is that things have reached such a stage that any change must be for the better. Owing to the gloom cast by the continued slump in Americans and the stringency in the money market, there has been a complete lack of buying power anywhere. The result has been that a moderate amount of liquidation found prices extremely susceptible, and the all-round fall, following upon the heavy shrinkage that occurred in the previous account—I might almost have said for many accounts—aroused at one time grave fears regarding the outcome of this week's Settlement. Fortunately, as the result of a good deal of arrangement between certain firms and their creditors, matters appear to have since been smoothed out sufficiently to avoid serious trouble. That there will be some failures is almost a foregone conclusion, but apparently the area of trouble will be restricted to the smaller fry. A certain measure of confidence was imparted by the announcement that the Stock Exchange will, after all, be shut on Saturday next, in accordance with the usual custom in Good Friday week. It was understood that, before deciding, the committee took counsel with the leading banks on the subject, and the fact that judgment was given in favour of a holiday has of itself done much to remove alarmist feelings as to the outcome of the Settlement. An event that did much to increase the nervous sentiment prevailing last week was the announcement of an advance from 3 to 3½ per cent. in the discount rate of the Bank of France. As the Paris authorities have made no change in their official rate for seven years—the last movement occurring on May 25, 1900, when a reduction took place from 3½ to 3—it was natural, perhaps, that the step should provoke a certain amount of suspicion, with markets in their present highly strung condition. But looked at calmly, there is no reason why the change should be regarded as in any way a sinister omen. Rather is it a matter for wonderment that the French have so long been practically unaffected by the monetary alarums and excursions prevailing at other leading international centres. Owing to the gold-hoarding policy pursued for some years by the Bank of France, and rendered possible by the various measures peculiar to that institution for preventing the free movement of the metal, Paris has been for the past seven years a kind of financial monastery. However, the directors of the Bank could not hope to prevent indefinitely the flow of water downhill, and of late the obligations of France to other countries, incurred because of the more attractive rates offered abroad than those at home, have rendered a rise in the Paris Bank rate necessary. So far as can be gathered, Paris a short time ago became indebted to the United States to a fairly large extent upon purchases of Railroad short term notes. She has also taken 11½ millions of Japanese bonds, the bulk of which is not unlikely to be transferred to this side because the old bonds which are to be replaced by the new issue are nearly all understood to be domiciled here. Further, French capitalists have taken a prominent part in subscribing for the new Argentine loan of £7,000,000, a matter which also seems likely to increase London's drawing power upon Paris. Under these circumstances, therefore, and bearing in mind the wide difference that still exists between money rates in France and those elsewhere, it is doubtful if the directors of the Bank of France expect to put a summary stop to the export of gold coin to London and other places; indeed, if such be their intention, it would not be surprising to see a further advance in the discount rate within the early future. Meanwhile, the City remains harassed by doubts as to our own Bank rate. It is to be hoped we shall be spared a return to the iron collar of 6 per cent., but the old lady of Threadneedle-street is not in a position to allow her reserves to be tampered with, and if New York commences to take gold from us in any large quantity a rise in the Bank rate may be regarded as a certainty.

With markets all painted in such drab colours, it was, perhaps, too much to expect any revival in Consols last week. There is, however, hope for the future in the sinking-fund purchases that apparently have already been commenced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. While irresponsible critics still rail against the Government for the depression in the funds caused by circumstances over which the present Administration has no control, the Government broker continues his daily visits to the Consol market, having purchased something like £50,000 of stock per day for the past three weeks. This is the best medicine for Consols, and, judging by the probable extent of the current year's surplus, it is evidently going to be applied in large doses. The effect may be hidden for a time, but later on it should be plainly evident, and the rally in the funds ought to do something towards improving the condition of other investment securities.

THE SITUATION IN HOME RAILS—A FAVOURABLE OPPORTUNITY FOR THE LONG-HEADED PURCHASER—HIGH YIELDS AND GROWING TRAFFIC RETURNS—SCOTTISH RAILS AND CO-OPERATION.

The past week has done nothing to repair the shattered fortunes of Home Railway stockholders, though a negative satisfaction may be derived from the fact that prices have only moved in sympathy with Stock Exchange securities as a whole, and that the fall in rails was less severe than in many other departments. That the market is ripening for a rally most people are in agreement; even brokers who for some years did not conceal their antipathy to Home Rails are beginning to relax their attitude now that stocks have got upon a yield basis of 4½ per cent. and even more, while traffic returns continue to show steady increases. Dear money, however, remains an effective barrier to an upward movement, and while the position in that respect keeps so unfavourable, it would be folly to recommend speculative operations in stocks. The appeal made by Home Rails is still to those capitalists who are in a position to take advantage of the present low range of prices to buy and to sit on their purchases for a twelvemonth at least. For some years the Home Railway market suffered more than any other department in the House from the combined effect of monetary stringency and declining dividends. Owing to the trade boom that began eighteen months ago, the fall in dividends—as regards the leading trade lines—has been summarily checked, the distributions made a month or two ago being in several cases the best for a number of years. The fact, therefore, that stocks have not only shown practically no response to this improvement in intrinsic conditions, but, on the contrary, are actually a good deal lower than they were before the trade revival set in, is conclusive evidence that it is the external circumstance of dear money which constitutes the market's evil genius. The Socialistic bogey, which has been so frequently trotted out by party politicians for electioneering purposes, has probably also done something to kindle prejudice against the railway market in the minds of British investors, and thereby tend to depress prices. Thus the sword wielded by those writers who pose as champions of the capitalist is a two-edged one, and I often hear, in imagination, the Stock Exchange, after reading the inflammatory epistles of the scare monger, praying to be saved from its friends. That the railways are in danger of anything savouring of confiscatory legislation I do not for one moment believe, and those who have allowed the subject to prey upon their nerves may derive some comfort from the remarks made in the House of Commons a few days ago by Mr. Lloyd-George—who has been freely pointed to as the apostle of anti-capitalist measures—to the effect that "nothing should be done to make railway investments so unremunerative that the companies could not get money for the purpose of development."

On the question of gross traffics the feature for some time past has been the virtual stagnation of passenger earnings in face of a substantial increment in goods receipts. Taking thirty-eight lines of the United Kingdom, whose figures have been collated by the Railway News, the aggregate showing for the eleven weeks of the half-year reveals total goods takings as £12,262,000, an increase of £387,000, and total passenger takings of £7,748,000, an advance of no more than £23,500. These results emphasise what I said a week ago in referring to the attractiveness of North-Westerns, North-Easterns, Great Northerns, and Hulls, which carry a preponderance of merchandise and mineral traffic. The way in which the Hull and Barnsley is forging ahead induces me to again single out this stock for the attention of the speculative investor. A return of 4¾ per cent., with a prospect of its being more, is not to be lightly refused even in these times of high-yielding stocks. The company, moreover, according to a rumour current in the market, has decided to postpone the proposed preference issue for the present. No doubt it is only awaiting a more favourable opportunity of getting placed, but delay is all in favour of the ordinary stockholders, so far as the current year is concerned. Reverting to the broad question of the slow improvement in railway passenger business, it may be hoped that with the advent of better weather we are about to witness an increase in the pace. It is, perhaps, significant that last week saw a distinct advance in the ratio of coaching increase, the results on the thirty-eight lines already referred to being: Passengers, £704,300—increase, £17,400; goods, £1,169,000—increase, £43,200. Given fine weather, there is reason to expect the coming Easter holidays to greatly stimulate passenger business, and in ordinary weeks this class of revenue ought to expand at a growing rate, as the benefits accruing from trade prosperity become more widely spread.

After the doleful reading made by the reports, it could hardly be expected that the Scottish Railway meetings held last week could produce much that was cheerful. The chairmen of the two leading lines did their best to meet anticipated criticism by dwelling upon the losses incurred by the strike in the Clyde shipbuilding yards, the clearance of snow from the tracks, and the repair of damage done by the blizzards; the great advance in compensation claims; and the rise in the price of materials. But the recital of these circumstances, all of which had been known and allowed for in advance as far as it was possible for the market to do so, did not remove the feeling that the underlying cause of the present dismal dividend position is the lavish expenditure on capital account that has been incurred for some years in pursuance of a policy of cut-throat rivalry. Evidently the boards themselves have begun to see that things have reached the critical stage, for at the meetings of the three leading companies each chairman had something to say about his willingness to co-operate more closely with his neighbours in order to reduce unnecessary expenditure. The Earl of Dalkeith made the most explicit declaration when at the meeting of the North British he declared that the whole business of the competing companies must be dealt with, and that the directors would give the matter their immediate attention, and that it was quite possible to come to a satisfactory arrangement. It is sincerely to be hoped that the suggestions thus thrown out will fructify in the direction of a practical working arrangement. Some security for the genuineness of these reform pleadings is contained in the fact that without definite promises of a changed policy neither company could hope to raise more money on reasonable terms. But, after all is said, what a thousand pities it is that the respective boards could not have been wiser before the event, instead of waiting until the inevitable effect of wasted substance compelled them to return to the path of financial rectitude.

Fresh Sensations in Yankees—Harriman and Hill Stocks Again Lead a Heavy Decline—Eries Another Very Weak Spot—The Outlook Considered—Hard to See Blue Sky Ahead.

After the temporary rebound that followed the mysterious two days' panic in Wall Street to which I referred a week ago, the slump in American Rails has broken out with fresh virulence. At the beginning of last week it appeared evident that stocks taken over in order to allay the panic were being turned adrift again, and, helped by this circumstance, the "bears" renewed their attacks with greater energy than ever. Now and again the market paused in its downward course, but only to permit of operators for the fall securing profits, and how values have suffered on the week may be gathered from the following table:—

Once or twice the market was agitated by reports that several large financial houses in New York were on the point of "going under." It was naturally not difficult to obtain credence for such rumours, after the landslide of the last few weeks. Up to the time of writing none of these reports crystallised into fact, but that certain people have incurred enormous losses goes without saying, and it is perhaps not to be wondered at that one of the principal market leaders was freely talked about last week as having been "cleaned out," and having to submit to his holdings being taken over.

The stocks of the Standard Oil, Harriman, and Hill roads were again the storm centre, though towards the end of the week Erie issues became sensationally weak upon the news that the Board, owing to the difficulty of raising capital, and the high cost of materials, would follow the example already set by the New York Central, Chicago Milwaukee, Atchison, and other railroads in suspending all proposed new construction. Thus, one after another the leading companies are shutting down upon work connected with the physical improvement of their systems, and the effect upon the industrial situation and upon railroad gross earnings must be pronounced; in the latter connection it is important to bear in mind that a large proportion of the enormous traffic carried by the railroads during the last few years has resulted from the heavy expenditure the railroad companies themselves have been making in order to add to the efficiency of the various systems. The market has already begun to feel the big effect upon operating costs produced by dear materials and advanced wages, and with the growth in gross takings threatened both on account of restriction of railroad construction and legislative enactment to lower passenger and freight rates the outlook cannot be regarded as roseate. There is no doubt that before long the question of the maintenance of dividends will become in a number of instances a very practical issue, and while it is early yet to attempt a detailed forecast, the possibility of reductions should be borne in mind by those apt to lay too much stress upon stock yields based on past distributions.

The more one hears of the unsatisfactory conditions prevailing on the railroads as regards the handling of traffic, the more is the conviction pressed home that the recent advances in dividend should never have been permitted, nor would have been, as a rule, except to serve some ulterior purpose. Mr. James J. Hill's recent statement that the railroads needed to spend $1,100,000,000 annually during the next five years in order to raise their physical standard to the needs of the times, was, perhaps not unnaturally, ridiculed by some critics, but admissions made subsequently by individual companies must leave those critics wondering whether the assertion was, after all, such a random shot as was supposed. For instance, to quote from the chairman of the Louisville and Nashville—a line which has hitherto ranked pretty high for its allowances upon betterments—it will be necessary to reduce grades and curvatures, construct second tracks, purchase new equipment, and secure further terminals and shops during the next five years at a cost of $100,000,000. As I have already stated, the companies for the moment are going slow in this matter of physical improvements, but the delay is merely due to the unfavourable combination of circumstances governing the money and labour markets and the political situation. Were these clouds to suddenly be dispersed, a contingency which is to the last degree unlikely, it would apparently be right to expect a resumption of new stock issues for big amounts by the companies generally. Looked at this way it is hard to see blue sky ahead for the American market.

Heavy Slump in Canadian Pacific—The Question of Canadian Passenger Fares—Argentine Rails and the Crops—The Poor Maize Outlook—Has it been Discounted Already?—Rosarios and the Dividend—Another 6 per Cent. Stock—United of Havana Debentures—An Attractive Investment.

Owing to the difficulties encountered by speculators in London as well as in New York and on the Continent, the past week has witnessed a heavy outpouring of Canadian Pacifics, and the price was driven down on Saturday to 167½, while on Monday a further break occurred to 164. Movements like this, while they need not seriously perturb the man who has bought Canadas for investment, must have awkward consequences for those people who have been so venturesome as to "bull" the shares. Under existing market conditions Canadas have derived no benefit from recent earnings, though the traffic return for the second week of March showed the handsome increase of $226,000, which was quite a return to old times. Reports, too, from the Dominion are generally couched in hopeful vein. The spring rush of immigrants from the old country to the North-West has started in earnest, and the Canadian Pacific has begun running special trains to accommodate the newcomers. Railway officials report that an enormous amount of west-bound traffic is being offered. Between now and the beginning of May a large number of new engines and cars will be received by the Canadian Pacific, thus relieving to a considerable extent the traffic congestion about which there has been such an outcry of late.

Grand Trunks have not escaped the depression shared by Stock Exchange securities as a whole; in fact the liquidation of those issues was particularly noticeable, a good deal of stock coming out in connection with options not exercised. Some people may have been led to sell by a decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners fixing the passenger rate on the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific systems at a maximum of 3 cents a mile in Eastern Ontario, and also in Alberta and Saskatchewan, as far west as the foot of the Rocky Mountains. A little investigation, however, soon showed that this decision would effect very little alteration in existing tariffs. The Grand Trunk's fares from Montreal to Toronto are already on a 3-cent basis, while so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned, the average amount received per passenger per mile in the year 1905-6 was under 2 cents, namely 1.80 cent. Apparently, therefore, this fixing of a maximum rate of 3 cents can at the worst only affect the companies in certain isolated instances. How Colonial and Foreign Rails have moved lately may be seen from the following table:—

The Argentine railway market, after a brief show of strength, succumbed with other things. It is, of course, necessary to keep in mind when considering the outlook for Argentine Rails that estimates of the maize crop, which will begin to be harvested in about a month's time, are for a crop 50 per cent. smaller than last year, owing to the damage wrought by drought and locusts. At the same time, if traffics are likely to show up less favourably later on, the companies have made such a splendid start in the current year that they can view a shortage in one crop with equanimity. Wheat, the carriage of which is the most profitable to the railways, has constituted a bumper crop, and altogether, making allowance for the heavier and better quality of wheat in the principal zones of production and the larger area under cultivation, the total export of cereals will, according to the latest estimates, be at least as large as those of last year, notwithstanding the assumed loss of half the maize crop. Glancing at current prices of stocks, it may reasonably be asked if the market has not already made liberal allowance for unfavourable possibilities. I referred a week or two ago to the fact that Buenos Ayres and Pacific Ordinary could be bought to yield 6 per cent.; now Rosarios must be included in the same category. The Rosario Board, as expected, has refrained from increasing the dividend this time, the 3½ per cent. just declared on the ordinary making the distribution for the twelve-month to December 31 6 per cent., or the same as for 1905. Seeing that the line earned over £500,000 more in gross during 1906, there was no question that a higher dividend could have been paid, even making allowance for a fair addition to working costs. As I pointed out some time ago, however, it was unlikely that the company would raise the dividend for the present; its policy is, first of all, to build up an adequate reserve fund, besides which the directors are no doubt anxious to avoid doing anything that might afford a peg for popular agitation against it, seeing that its fusion with the old Central Argentine (which no doubt is believed by many stockholders to have been all settled years ago) still awaits ratification by the Government. As an investment, "Rosies" at 103, cum 3½ points dividend, should surely be worth picking up.

Another stock in the foreign railway group that is worthy the notice of my readers is United of Havana Five per Cent. Irredeemable Debentures (1906). Those who know anything of the recent history of this railway will agree that its debenture stocks rank almost as gilt-edged securities. The special attraction about the 1906 debentures is their price in relation to the older irredeemable stock. While the latter stands at about 114, the former can be bought (taking the quotation at the time of writing) at 109, or say 108½, making allowance for the fact that it is obtainable free of stamp. On the question of merits there is very little to choose between the two issues. The 1906 stock ranks after the earlier issue upon the old line, but constitutes a first charge upon the Cardenas and Jucaro system, to partly meet the cost of acquiring which line was the object for which most of it was created. That brings me to the real explanation for the present comparative cheapness of the 1906 stock. Being a recent creation, and moreover being offered largely to Cuban people, who did not want to take it up—because of the high yields obtainable on local investments—a fair amount of the issue has not yet found a permanent home. Later on, when the floating supply becomes better absorbed, the prices for the Consolidated Fives and the 1906 issue will probably be identical. At the present price the yield is 4⅝ per cent.

South Africans Depressed under General Market Conditions—The Labour Policy of the New Transvaal Ministry—Randfontein Report.

The tide has still to turn in favour of the holders of Kaffirs. During the past week the general tendency has been unfavourable, but, considering market conditions as a whole, this group has, perhaps, given less cause for complaint than most others. The hoped-for statement by the new Transvaal Ministry as to its policy in regard to the labour question has been duly made, but the market has been more concerned with influences other than those connected with the Rand mining industry. The main factor has been the uncertainty as to the outcome of the Settlement, and until this is removed it seems hopeless to look for much improvement in market conditions. Doubts on this score, however, should soon be settled one way or the other, this being pay day, and it would certainly seem that the worst has been fully discounted. In part the set-back in Kaffir prices that has occurred during the past week has been due to sales of stock in connection with options which had been opened for the end-March account. Prices having fallen, those who had given for the call of shares did not exercise their option, and the grantors of the options who had followed the usual course of purchasing half the amount of stock consequently realised their protective holdings. In addition, the Kaffir market has been affected by liquidation of a forced character, and there having been little inclination to lend support in view of the uncertainty surrounding the outlook, the realisations have naturally had more effect upon share values than they would have had under normal conditions. The following table of the prices of the large speculative counters will give an idea of how prices have fared on the week:—

The policy outlined by the new Transvaal Ministry in respect to the labour question is in accordance with the statements made before the elections, and with the terms of General Botha's speech at Pretoria subsequent to his becoming Premier. It is not proposed to repatriate the Chinese until an efficient substitute, either in the form of fresh labourers or labour-saving machinery, is found. If substitutes cannot be found, the indentures of the Chinese will be temporarily renewed. It is pointed out that with the exception of the indentures of some 400 coolies which expire at the end of June, no indentures are due to expire until August, and as the Legislature will reassemble early in June it is expected that the situation will be dealt with in time to prevent a steady exodus of labour from the mines. It is generally considered that the policy outlined means that the progress of the mining industry will not be seriously interfered with, and it is thought that Kaffirs stand a good chance of being among the first securities to present a more cheerful appearance when general conditions on the Stock Exchange return to normal. The announcement of the Transvaal gold output for the current month—or the anticipation thereof—should tend to assist the market, as the figures are likely to be better than any issued so far.

The annual reports of the companies comprising the Robinson group have now been issued on this side, and I propose next week to review the results and prospects of the gold mines. Meanwhile, I will deal with the important financial undertaking of this group, namely, the Randfontein Estates, which is the parent of twelve subsidiaries. This company's operations last year resulted in a net profit of £120,000, compared with £140,000 in 1905, and the carry forward is thereby increased to £3,574,000. The cash in hand at the end of the year amounted to £658,000, and accrued dividends to £81,436. Shares held represented £5,274,059, but out of this holding the scrip dividend to holders of Randfontein Estates is to be taken. Debentures held by the company stood in the books at £975,000. These comprise the whole of the Debentures issued by the four producing subsidiary mines, and they return the parent company a steady income. Now that the labour outlook is considered satisfactory by the management of this group, an active policy is to be pursued; work on the eight Randfontein subsidiaries which have not yet reached the production stage is to be pushed on, and an increased output by the four which are already contributing to the gold output of the Transvaal is foreshadowed.

There has been a fair amount of activity in diamond shares, and De Beers have been particularly erratic. Following the set-back as a result of forced liquidation to which I referred last week, De Beers came into strong demand on French account, but they have since given way with other descriptions, and show a substantial decline on the week:—

While on the subject of Diamond shares I may mention that the report of the Orange Free State and Transvaal Diamond Mines—a member of the Robinson group of companies—has just been issued, and shareholders will be glad to learn that the policy of inactivity which has been followed in respect of the company's property is to be abandoned for one of activity. The directors have now under consideration a scheme for the further development and more extensive testing of the mine, "and to enable them to achieve this object the board will communicate with shareholders at an early date." Does this mean they will be asked to provide more money? According to the report the cash on hand amounts to £28,000, and this should surely go a good way towards the thorough testing of the property.

Rhodesians have participated in the general tendency towards a lower level of values, and it has not taken much liquidation to depress the prices of these descriptions, there being less inclination to support them than Kaffirs at present. The subjoined table shows how prices have moved on the week:—

WESTRALIANS INACTIVE—PRICES GENERALLY LOWER BUT IVANHOES SHOW IMPROVEMENT—GREAT BOULDER AND LANCEFIELD PROSPECTS.

Business has been on a small scale in the Westralian market during the past week. What was transacted was mainly in the nature of realisations, and in most cases prices have given way, but it will be seen from the following table of quotations that the decline has not been serious, even though in the narrow state of the market it takes little actual business to move prices.

It will be noticed that Ivanhoe is the only share to show any improvement. In my last notes I dealt at some length with the position of this company, and expressed the opinion that the shares are "one of the best holdings in the whole list of mining securities." During the past week there has been some quiet buying of these shares for investment. The final dividend for 1906 is now officially announced, and the amount is, as I foreshadowed, 9s. per share, bringing the total distribution for the past year up to 24s. per share, which is equivalent to a yield of about 16 per cent. on the current market price of the shares. Advices just to hand by mail from the colony as to the development of the mine make satisfactory reading—in fact, they state that, "generally speaking, the prospects of the Ivanhoe were never brighter than they are at the present time." Reports of an encouraging character are also to hand in regard to the way the Great Boulder mine is opening up, and before very long the production of this company should show expansion as the plant for treating the accumulated slimes will probably be in full operation in about a month's time. According to the manager, there are 500,000 tons of slimes available, and he estimates that they will yield a profit of about 4s. per ton. The new plant is estimated to treat about 400 tons per day, on which basis an additional profit of over £2,000 per month should be earned. Among the smaller priced Westralians there has been a little demand recently for Lancefields, it being expected that the April return will make a comparatively good showing, and that henceforth the company will be a steady profit-earner on a satisfactory scale.

Deep Leads have given way again, there being little inclination to accord fresh support pending the receipt of encouraging news from the Loddon Valley.

Copper Shares Active and Erratic—Rio Tinto Dividend—Broken Hills Depressed—The Ooregum New Issue.

The volume of business transacted in shares of the Copper group has continued on a pretty large scale, and the leading issues have been very erratic. On the dividend announcement Rio Tintos' came into strong favour among French speculators and the price rallied sharply, but with other descriptions these shares have suffered from liquidation, and it will be seen that on the week they show a further loss although they have been up to over 97 in the interim:—

The Tinto dividend of £3 per share is in accordance with the general anticipations as recorded in my notes a few weeks back, but some optimists had looked for as much as £3 10s. per share. The distribution announced makes, with the interim dividend, a return of £5 10s. per share for the whole of 1906, which represents a yield of 6 per cent. with the quotation at 90. The total distribution mentioned compares with £4 per share in respect of 1905, and the increase is, of course, due to the advance in the price of the metal, which averaged not far short of £20 per ton higher last year than in 1905. At the present time the price of the metal is over £100 per ton, and has recently been over £110 per ton, and if a high market value for a prolonged period could be relied upon the shares would still appear an attractive purchase, especially as it is understood that the company is making arrangements to considerably increase its production. For official information as to this reported extension the directors' report is awaited with considerable interest. The set-back in the copper quotation during the past week has served to remind speculators that the metal market is a factor of importance in connection with the prospects of the share market. It is to be borne in mind that while for the present the demand is likely to equal the supply, increased production by established undertakings is foreshadowed, and, ultimately, some at any rate, of new copper propositions which have come forward on the strength of the high price ruling for the metal will become contributors to the output. To revert to the share market—Anacondas have fluctuated considerably, and are also lower on the week. But, with normal market conditions, it is thought that these shares will be taken in hand and that the price will recover at least a few points. The dividend due to be declared on Anacondas next month is expected to be at an increased rate. The last quarterly distribution was 1¾ dol. per share, or at the rate of 28 per cent. per annum. The Australian copper issues have been mostly depressed by further forced liquidation. Satisfactory reports continue to come to hand with regard to Mount Lyell developments, but the market in the shares has not been able to withstand the general depression, the large account open for the rise in these shares rendering them all the more susceptible to adverse influences. One or two of the smaller priced shares, however, have shown strength, notably Munganas and Chillagoes. There has been colonial buying of these, and I learn that mail advices from the Colony in respect to the last named are of such a character as would lead one to expect a fairly substantial advance in the quotation under better general market conditions.

In the Broken Hill group there has been forced liquidation, and in the absence of fresh support of any volume prices have dropped away. There has been a general disinclination to open fresh speculative commitments pending the outcome of the Settlement, and there may seem little to encourage mining investors to jump in at the moment, but a period of general depression affords opportunities for securing bargains, and those in a position to take their purchases off the market have now a chance to pick up shares at reduced prices in most departments, not the least attractive of which is the Broken Hill group. The delay in issuing further information as to the Zinc Corporation's position has induced further realisations of the shares. It is contended in some quarters that all through the recent period of activity the management has rather played into the hands of those who have been doing their best to depress the price of the shares, as the information officially issued to shareholders has been scanty, though it was not to be expected that the directors would issue a denial to every rumour circulated in the market. However, I do not think those who bought the shares with a view to dividends should be frightened into throwing their holdings on the market at this juncture. Even if profits do not work out at quite so high a rate as has been predicted, there should be enough to permit of a very satisfactory return on the current price of the shares, if not on the highest level touched during the current year. According to an interview with Mr. F. A. Govett, the chairman of the Zinc Corporation, published in yesterday's Financial Times, there has been a preliminary trial with another process, for which the present plant can be easily adapted if it is decided to abandon the method originally followed. Delay in getting results has been caused by the labour shortage and inability to get plant delivered promptly. Mr. Govett summed up the position as follows:—"The conclusion to be drawn . . . seems to be that even if the Potter Process, with magnetic separation tacked on, is not as remunerative as the Cattermole method, at any rate success will be obtained from either one or the other, and it ought not to be very long before this point is decided."

West Africans, American gold shares, the Tin group, and Siberians have all participated in the general depression, but the Indian gold shares have been comparatively firm. In my notes last week I commented upon the proposal by the Mysore directors to establish a mine redemption fund, and remarked that it was an interesting departure from the usual policy of those responsible for the management of the Indian gold mines, the usual procedure being to divide profits practically up to the hilt instead of creating a reserve. An interesting object-lesson with respect to the effect of this policy is provided by the experience of the Ooregum Company, whose annual report has been issued since my former remarks were published. This company is paying a final dividend of 9d. per share on both ordinary and preference shares, making a total return for 1906 of 1s. 3d. per share on the ordinary and 2s. 3d. on the preference, absorbing £54,687. The directors also recommend the issue of 137,000 new ordinary shares—thus increasing the capital for the fifth time in the company's history—and ask the shareholders to subscribe for them at par, that is, 10s. apiece. The proportion being one new for every five shares at present held, this is equivalent to asking holders to pay out 2s. per share. The reason for this new issue of shares is that the company, although it is paying dividends, "has no cash for working capital." It must either charge the profits with the whole of the expenditure on capital account or raise fresh funds. The first alternative, the directors state, "would leave sufficient margin for only a very small dividend on the ordinary shares," and they think it would impose an unfair burden upon the holders of those shares. "On the other hand," the directors add, "fresh capital being provided, the profit as earned, not being unduly taxed with expenditure properly chargeable to capital, would be available for distribution in dividends." My readers will be able to judge for themselves as to the sounder policy of the two, and consideration of this matter should make it clear to them that the shares of the Indian group of which the Ooregum is a member must be regarded as more speculative than those of companies which are managed financially on conservative lines.

A Protean Pair of Company Promoters.

The public inquiry into the affairs of the Welsh Slate Quarries, Limited, and the North Wales Slate Quarries, Limited, which Mr. Registrar Hood concluded in the London Bankruptcy Court last week, was of peculiar interest to me, in view of the attention that I have from time to time bestowed upon the promoters of these concerns. The promoters were Messrs. Walter Darby and Henry Warwick Gyde, but they are more widely (if not more unfavourably) known under various aliases than under their real names. No doubt many of my readers will recollect the frequent references in Truth a few years ago to a shady bucket-shop purporting to be carried on by "Maynard, Grant, and Co." That was a nom de guerre of Messrs. Darby and Gyde. At different periods and different addresses this Protean pair of City harpies have also preyed upon the public as "McAndrew, Robinson, and Co.," "W. Darby and Co.," "F. C. Lawson and Co.," "Walter Scott and Co.," and "The City of London Investment Corporation." It was in the character of the "Corporation"—registered in Guernsey with a nominal capital of £100,000, but with only £11 15s. issued—that they brought out the two above-mentioned quarry companies. The financial history of these undertakings is sufficiently described in the following extract from the evidence of a Mr. G. H. Dodgson, one of the directors:—

> In the case of the North Wales Company over £3,000 was subscribed by the public for debentures, and only about £40 was received from the sale of slates. They paid about £2,600 to the promoters, £5 5s. weekly as fees to the directors, over £400 for stamping circulars, and various amounts for travelling expenses of the directors. With regard to the Welsh Quarries Company, over £14,000 was subscribed by the public for debentures and £13 odd was realised from the sale of slates. The promoters were paid something over £9,000 in cash, £3,000 odd went in printing, stationery, and stamps, and between £800 and £900 was paid for rent and wages.

Mr. Dodgson was hired as a director at a fee of a guinea a week to perform what he described as the "quite nominal" duties of attending the weekly board meetings and signing the various documents placed before him. The several prospectuses that were issued contained grossly misleading and inaccurate statements, but Mr. Dodgson said that "after the first he did not trouble to read before signing them." Major-General Sir John W. Campbell became the chairman of both companies at the invitation of Messrs. Darby and Gyde. He received £100 a year in fees from each company. He said he did ask a good many questions before signing the prospectuses, but having no personal knowledge of the value of the quarries, he accepted the replies that were given to him. The Major-General was also a trustee for the debenture holders in both companies. One trust deed provided for a half-yearly drawing of fifty of the £10 ten per cent. debentures, to be paid off at £11 10s. each. He was present at a drawing when forty-seven out of the fifty bonds drawn for redemption turned out to belong to the promoters. This did not strike him as peculiar; "but then," the Major-General naïvely added, "he had seen so many curious things in connection with companies." No doubt. He has been connected with other companies, and, as he admitted, "the connection was not a happy one." Mr. Gyde also professed his inability to explain what the Official Receiver called "the conjuring trick" at the drawing of the debentures.

These quarry companies are but two out of a numerous progeny of rotten companies which Messrs. Darby and Gyde have brought forth with disastrous results to confiding investors. In each case they adopt the same modus operandi. A company is formed to purchase some small undertaking at a huge price. The directors, or the majority of them, are mere puppets of the promoters; the latter get practically all the money that can be extracted from the public by means of misleading prospectuses and a skilfully-conducted "unloading" campaign, and sooner or later the company reaches its inevitable end in the Bankruptcy Court. One of the most notorious of Messrs. Darby and Gyde's enterprises was the Kent County Gas and Coke Company, floated in 1906 to acquire, at the price of £21,800, some works which had been sold in the previous year for £2,350. This concern, which is now being wound up, came under the notice of Mr. Justice Joyce a few months ago in an action by some of the defrauded shareholders. It was shown that the directors were aware that statements in the prospectuses were untrue, and also that they went to allotment—which, the Judge said, it was neither right nor honest for them to do—owing to the pressure of the promoters. In the course of this judgment his lordship remarked:—

> The prospectus was a most cunningly devised document. He did not think he had ever seen a prospectus more artfully framed to entrap the unwary and the inexperienced. He had no hesitation in saying that the bringing out of this company was nothing better than a swindle, and the public had been most grossly defrauded by somebody. If there was further litigation, he thought it would be found that somebody was a knave and a cheat.

The West Suburban Gas Company, Limited, now in liquidation, the South Luton District Gas Light and Coke Company, and the London and Hull Soap Works, Limited, have also been among the schemes of these prolific promoters. During his examination in the case of the quarry companies Mr. Gyde mentioned that he and Mr. Darby were now trading at London Wall as Walter Scott and Co. The Official Receiver asked what the business was. "To tell you the honest truth," the witness replied, "there is practically no business now." For the sake of the public one would like to believe that the operations of these gentry have come to an end. Unfortunately, however, investors are so credulous and the law is so lax that it is only too likely that Messrs. Darby and Gyde will soon be engaged again in the same old game.

Devonshire Investors and the Cotton Trade.

New mills have been springing up like mushrooms in Lancashire since the cotton trade entered upon its present remarkable spell of prosperity. It is surprising, however, to learn that the demand for capital for these projects has so far outgrown the local supply that this wealthy and flourishing manufacturing district is now reduced to the extremity of borrowing money from the comparatively poor population of Devonshire. In an advertisement "to investors" in an Ilfracombe newspaper, it is notified that the Bamber Bridge

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

Spinning and Weaving Company, Limited, "have now opened their Loan Deposit Account, and are prepared to receive loans of £100 and upwards, repayable at call or for a term, bearing interest at 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. per annum, according to amount or term." An application to the secretary at Bamber Bridge elicits the information that the company's mill is "being built," that the share list "opened in November and is expected to close in March," and that "the loans account will be kept open a little longer." Accompanying the secretary's letter is a picture postcard showing the architect's design for the mill—a very fine and large building. But that design has not yet materialised in bricks and mortar, and in the circumstances I think that investors in Devonshire or any other distant place would be well advised to leave the privilege of lending cash to this Bamber Bridge company to the capitalists of Bamber Bridge.

Insurance Notes—Life Assurance as a Whole.

In certain ways the Insurance Department of the Board of Trade is an excellent institution. It is the medium through which life assurance companies of the United Kingdom publish to the world their accounts, in ways which purport to be in accordance with the schedules of the Life Assurance Companies Acts. If, for reasons of its own, any life office chooses to depart from those schedules, and to insist on details being published in the official returns in a form which exhibits its proceedings in an unduly favourable light, the Board of Trade is quite complacent, and includes in the official records any figures which life assurance companies choose to send. In giving evidence before the House of Lords Committee, the Chief Clerk of the Insurance Department of the Board of Trade testified that his Department never had insisted upon true returns, and appeared to consider this a perfectly conclusive reason why they never should insist upon compliance with the Act. To people who, like myself, regard red tape with less reverence than this, the practice seems indefensible, and the deduced consequences inconclusive. Perhaps when the Life Assurance Companies' Acts are amended some steps will be taken, not merely to require a considerable amount of useful information which is not demanded at present, but to insist upon the information being given accurately, regardless of whether or not it is convenient to certain assurance companies to reveal the truth about themselves.

These deviations from strict conformity with the schedules are of importance in regard to individual companies, but they have comparatively little effect upon the tabulated statements of the business as a whole, which are included in the Blue Book that has just been published, and which constitute the official record of British life assurance companies. This record, published in March, 1907, refers for the most part to the accounts for the year 1905. Already a great many companies have issued their reports for the year 1906, and almost any mail may bring from New York the official records of American life offices up to the end of December, 1906. It is thus apparent that in our leisurely British way our latest official records are comparatively ancient history; if the position of a life office is rotten our existing system allows it a superfluous twelve months in which to victimise the ignorant and to proceed from bad to worse. This long delay in publishing accounts ought to be abolished when the Life Assurance Companies Acts are amended; it would be no undue interference with the affairs of the offices to require all of them to make up their accounts to the end of December each year, and to deposit them with the Board of Trade before the end of March at the latest. The Blue Book could then be presented to Parliament in April or May, and be comparatively up to date.

The summaries of the accounts published in the Blue Book are of considerable interest, even if they are rather much out of date. They do not supply a record of the life assurance business of the British Isles; they exclude the British business of Colonial and American life offices, and they include the Colonial and foreign business of English and Scottish life offices. It would be a distinct improvement if all companies, British and foreign, were compelled to give returns of their business in the United Kingdom and Ireland, and if this were made the basis of the official summaries. Still, we will look at the figures for what they are worth, which, after all, is a good deal. The summary of the revenue accounts is as follows:—

From these figures it appears that the rate of interest earned upon the funds was £3 15s. 4d. per cent. by Ordinary companies, and £3 8s. 9d. per cent. by Industrial offices. This is a falling off in the past thirty years of about 8s. per cent. on the Ordinary funds and 3s. 6d. per cent. on Industrial funds. There is reason to suppose that the Blue Book to be published next year will show an appreciable improvement in this respect. It should, however, be remembered that the essential thing in insurance matters is to compare the rate of interest earned upon the funds with the rate assumed in valuing the liabilities. There is no doubt that this margin is larger at the present time than it was in previous years, and that consequently the financial position of life offices as a whole is stronger than formerly, and the profit for the policy-holders from this source larger than it used to be.

In both the Ordinary and the Industrial companies the proportion of the premium income that is absorbed in commission and expenses is less than it used to be. According to the present Blue Book the expenses are 13.5 per cent. of the Ordinary premiums, and 43.4 per cent. of the Industrial premiums; I am by no means sure, however, that these ratios indicate any real increase in economy. Owing to the much greater prevalence now than formerly of endowment assurances and other comparatively expensive policies, an equal amount of expenditure appears as a lower proportion of the premiums received. Still, speaking not so much from official statistics as from general experience of individual companies, I think it is safe to say that although a few inferior offices are incurring much heavier expenses than before, the bulk of the best companies are spending less than formerly.

The total ordinary assurances in force, according to these official returns, which, in this respect, are on the average at least three or four years out of date, exceed £713,000,000. Of this amount 81.5 per cent. participate in profits, and 18.5 are without-profit policies. About 65 per cent. are policies under which the sum assured is paid only at death; 29 per cent. are endowment assurances payable at a specified age or at death, if previous, and 6 per cent. are miscellaneous policies of other kinds. The significant feature of these statistics is the enormous increase in endowment assurances. When these figures were first published in the Blue Books endowment assurances were 6 per cent. of the whole, and whole life policies were more than 90 per cent. It is permissible to be sceptical as to whether this change is beneficial to either the policy-holders or the companies.

Romano's Restaurant, Strand.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's—I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire."

Whatever criticisms may be made in regard to detailed points of these records, there is no doubt whatever that British life assurance, as a whole, is steadily growing stronger and better year by year. The unassailable financial strength of the good companies is little short of amazing, and it is gratifying to see from these official returns of the life assurance business of the country that people in ever increasing numbers avail themselves of the advantages which it offers.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

RAILWAYS.

Rex.—No. 1 would be a fair lock-up purchase. The present price carries the dividend. No. 4 has fair speculative prospects, but I see little to go for in the others. Curragh.—Yes. D. W. E.—I do not regard the outlook favourably, and would refrain from buying either. Rancheroo.—Many thanks for your second interesting letter. Apparently losses in one direction are being compensated for by gains in others, for traffics lately have been showing a welcome improvement. Perplexed.—I doubt if you would be able to arrange any large deal at the lower rate mentioned. The difference can only be explained by the fact that one firm is willing to take greater risk There is scope for an option on the cheaper terms you name, but as regards your last question I must refer you to Rule 8.

MINES.

C. C. C.—I gave a short list of selections last week. Purchases should yield a fair profit when business becomes more active. Euterpe.—I see little attraction in these at present. F. S. D., Brisbane.—I am much obliged by your letter and the papers. Marmo.—I would hold Taquahs for a recovery in price. The share is one of the best selections among West Africans. Rusticus.—A purchase of Arizonas would be a hopeful speculation. Sigma.—The shares should have some recovery before very long. With regard to No. 4, I am unable to give you an answer; you should address the query to the Goldfields Company. B. J. S.—Hold all for the present, but take advantage of a moderate recovery to realise. Instead of putting further money into these I would suggest your making a selection from the short list given in my notes last week. H. A. D.—They are a speculation rather than an investment—that is, if you refer to the London and West Australian Exploration shares. There is a fair chance of a moderate recovery.

MIXED SECURITIES.

Reader.—1 Cosmopolitans and Consolidated Deep Leads are hopeful speculative purchases among low-priced mining shares. 2. No. 3. There is nothing much to go for in a purchase of this stock. Winton.—1-5. The stocks are desirable purchases, though in buying the various Government issues you had better give the preference to the Three per Cents., as, standing now at a discount, these offer more scope for an ultimate levelling up in price. 6. The Three and Three and a Halfs are full fledged Trustee stocks. R. R., Sittingbourne.—It would be hard to beat Great Western Five per Cent. Consolidated Guaranteed, which yields 5½ per cent. Red Rose.—1-4. I should be inclined to sell. 5 and 6. Keep these for the present. Ocean.—1 and 2. Have nothing to do with these; the Charing Cross Bank is really a common usury shop, run by a man named Carpenter. 3-6. All four are fair purchases, the most attractive being 3 and 6. Erex.—1. The Shares are sound enough, and you might well buy, so long as you do not mind the heavy uncalled liability. 2. I have never suggested that Seconds should be avoided. But there is at present so small a difference between the prices of the two that I am inclined to give the preference to the senior issue when advising intending purchasers. 3. The limitation of the guarantee is, without doubt, a principal cause of the lowness of price. The railways are not doing at all grandly, and the ultimate position of the debenture holders is doubtful. 4. Advisable, though I should hesitate to apply the term "safe." Vortex.—1. A very doubtful holding. I should be inclined to cut the loss. 2. Worth holding for an ultimate improvement. 3. Quite good. Straightforward.—A very unattractive list. Renda, County Cavan, Quilla, and others. Will reply next week. Fitzroy. Better realise now what you do not require the discount being only 4—than sell the other securities at the moment. Deutsch.—A fair investment. Naval.—A pure speculation, and hardly attractive. 2. If you refer to Niger Company shares, they are worth holding. B. B. B.—Vickers and the other Iron shares might be held. No 2 makes a fair holding of its class; but 5 might be sold. I cannot trace No. 3. Bowler, Aberdeen.—They might go a little higher in view of the better tea prospects. Hold a little longer. Mafalda.—Schweppe Deferred are rather speculative, but the others are fair. Glasgow.—Might be held for the time being.

INSURANCE.

Ajax.—1. National Provident Institution. 2. Perfectly safe, bonus likely to decrease Rosslyn.—You would probably be disappointed if you continued; personally I should surrender or lapse. W. T.—I shall very likely deal with the whole question of bond companies before long.

MISCELLANEOUS.

W. S., Junior.—See Rule 8 as to recommendations. I may say, however, that the public have been warned against the first of the two firms you name. The sum mentioned is too small for the purchase of shares; have nothing to do with any system of so-called "marginal investment," which is really a gamble. Inexperienced, Lieutenant R.F.A., F. Mc. E., and Doris.—I do not give advice as to purchases of foreign Government and Municipal premium bonds. As I have repeatedly explained, the International Securities Syndicate, Cunliffe, Russell and Co., and other touting firms, charge prices enormously in excess of the actual market value of the bonds. St. Briar.—You could bring an action against Cunliffe, Russell and Co. for the return of your money, and if you wish to write again I will put you in communication with a Paris solicitor, who has successfully conducted many similar cases against this notorious firm. Ikona.—I do not see the quotations to which you refer. As to the firm, I have had no reason to criticise it, but I cannot make any recommendation. Read Rule 8. D. R.—See preceding answer. H. R., Birkenhead, and H. R. H. D.—Thanks for the circulars. Pack.—It is impossible to express an opinion without seeing the lists referred to in the letter. J. C. B. and G. A. L.—My readers have already been warned against these bucket-shops. Gainsborough.—The fact that he has paid you and your friend does not prove his bona fides, and the idea that he is a philanthropic capitalist bent upon making money for his customers at the expense of his own pocket is manifestly absurd. Have you ever received inquiries about him from any one? Karlos.—I know of nothing against the firm, but this does not mean that I recommend them. I certainly do not advise a speculation on the method described. A. G. L.—Leave these bonds alone. Welshman.—Hold what you have. Commutator.—The threatened licensing legislation seems to be the only reason for the fall. Should be kept, if you have any. Athenæum.—Usually, of course, directors take all the fees they are entitled to. Edwinstowe.—I should advise you to deal with a member of the Stock Exchange; but see Rule 8. With regard to your first list, numbered 1 to 6, I think it would be a pity to part with such first-rate securities as the Bank shares, the Corporation stock, and Local Loans; No. 5 should also be held. As to No. 6, prospects are partly dependent upon the settlement of the bulk supply question, but on the whole I should be disposed to keep these shares. Of your second list (Nos. 1 to 6), hold Furness and Hulls for the reasons mentioned a week ago. The Indian Native stock is quite good, and ought to be kept. As to No. 1, you do not say whether it is preferred or deferred stock. Nos. 5 and 6 ought to be kept. Doubtful, Arbroath.—1. Inquire of the secretary. 2. Leave them alone. G. R., Richmond.—A warning against this firm appeared in TRUTH quite recently. I will repeat it in an early issue. F. B., Blackburn.—I believe you are legally liable; but you had better consult a solicitor. H. A.—The remarkable prospectus of the Provincial Billposting Company hardly seems to require serious criticism. Shamrock, Derry.—I regret that I am unable to give you his address. Wali Dad.—I have not had occasion to criticise this firm, but as you will see from Rule 8, I cannot make any recommendation beyond saying that it is better to do business with a member of the Stock Exchange. Country Bumpkin.—Some, if not all, the desired information could be obtained at Somerset House, but I cannot undertake to search the register for the purpose. Leviathan.—1. Probably all right while acting as agent for good insurance company. Security doubtful if issuing its own policies. 2. I do not recommend it as an investment. 2 and 4 are poor. 3. You might hold. 5. Not very attractive. R. F. W.—It is not in my province to fill up such a form. You had better get a stockbroker to do the business.

THE TURKISH MATCH GAMBLE—DAIMLER AND DUNLOP MEETINGS—MOTOR 'BUS AMALGAMATION—ARMSTRONG'S—DRAPERY DIVIDENDS.

In the Miscellaneous Market the discussion relating to the New Founders' Association has provided a little serio-comic diversion amid the prevailing gloom. To all except the losers in the gamble that has been going on the story of this undertaking is really rather amusing. Nearly five years have passed since the Association was formed with a capital of £30,000 (since increased to £33,000) to acquire a quarter interest in a monopoly for the sale of matches in the Ottoman Empire. That monopoly, however, is not yet established, and since the issue of a circular in 1904 affirming that "the prospects of the company were never better," no official announcement has been made by the directors, nor has any meeting of the shareholders been held. But various rumours have been spread so industriously and ingeniously that in the past few months the shares, after being unsaleable at 10s., were put up to £10, from which point they have recently been dropping, with the result that demands have once more been made for the publication of some definite statement regarding the position of the company. The directors remain silent, though a statement has appeared to the effect that the company knows nothing of the market movements, "which are (it is said) engineered against its will by parties over whom its officials have no control." A flood of light has, however, been thrown on the situation by the publication of a letter from Sir Edward Grey. Under the articles of the Berlin Treaty the grant of such a concession by the Sultan is ineffective without the sanction of the Great Powers, and Sir Edward Grey's letter states that the British Government is opposed to the establishment of a match monopoly in Turkey, and that all reports as to a cessation of this opposition are without foundation. In these circumstances the surprising thing is not that the shares have fallen during the past few days, but that they have not fallen still lower. Hudson's Bays suffered severely in the slump at the end of the week, dropping to 100 for the first time for many months.

The meeting of the Daimler Motor Company passed the resolution approving of the proposed re-arrangement of the capital, but not without some opposition on the part of a section of the preference shareholders, whose existing rights are to be extinguished. The scheme is, no doubt, partly responsible for a further slight decline in both the preference and the ordinary issues of the company, though motor and cycle shares generally have been affected by the common tendency downwards. In connection with the invitation to the shareholders of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company to subscribe for an issue of shares in the Dunlop Rubber Company—one of the subsidiary undertakings—at a premium of £5 per £1 share, I have had a letter from a shareholder calling attention to a paragraph in the prospectus relating to the salaries and commissions that are to be paid to the two managing directors. My correspondent has probably seen that this matter was mentioned at the meeting of the Tyre Company in Dublin last Wednesday. No doubt he has also seen that it is a somewhat dangerous subject to deal with, the Chairman, Mr. Harvey du Cros, having intimated that he once held "the heavy-weight championship," and that if he had been near him he would have knocked down one of the shareholders who had spoken. This method of answering a critic seems to have had the approval of the meeting, and not being an ex-heavy-weight champion myself, I think I had better say nothing more about it. The proposed amalgamation of the Vanguard and three other motor omnibus companies is being opposed by a committee of shareholders, who announce that they intend to take certain action which has been recommended by counsel to give effect to their opposition. The reason assigned for this course is "the conviction that the amalgamation scheme was being forced through wholly in the interests of the directors and their friends, the holders of the shilling deferred shares"—a view of the matter for which there is a good deal to be said. Of the flourishing condition of the engineering trades a further proof has been given in the satisfactory report of Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co. The accounts cover only the six months ended December 31, 1906, it having been decided to end the financial year on that date instead of on June 30 as hitherto; but in that period there has been a substantial increase of profits, and the dividend on the ordinary shares for the half-year is 10 per cent. The dividend was better than had been expected, and a slight rise in the shares has been recorded. The report of the Salt Union reveals an increase in the net profit; but it is too small to offer much encouragement to the shareholders. For the second year in succession the preference dividend is passed, while the ordinary shareholders have received nothing since 1897, when they got 1 per cent. During the past week or so the reports of several companies have borne testimony to the prosperity of the drapery trade in London. D. H. Evans and Co. are paying 22½ per cent. on the ordinary shares, Peter Robinson 18 per cent., Swan and Edgar 15 per cent. on both the preference and the ordinary shares; John Barker and Co. 12½ per cent., and Dickins and Jones 14 per cent. These dividends are in their turn a striking indication of the prosperity of the middle classes, on whose custom the shops mainly depend. VIGILANT.

QUEER STORY.

THE KEY OF THE SITUATION.

"TELL Mr. Pillinger I should like to see him for a minute."

The speaker was the editor of that popular weekly, Up-to-Date. It was the Thursday afternoon before Easter, and the issue for the current week had been published that morning; but the editor had remained up at the office a day later than usual in order to get forward with his arrangements for next week's issue—a step rendered imperative by the disturbing intervention of the approaching holiday.

The editor was a man of large frame, of shrewd, withal good-humoured, countenance, and of genial personality. His labours were just completed, and he lounged comfortably back in his chair, soothing tired nature with an excellent cigarette, while he awaited the compliance of Mr. Pillinger with his summons.

In two or three minutes Mr. Pillinger made his appearance. He was a young man—nearly young enough to be the editor's son—but the gravity and sobriety of his demeanour imparted to him the air of being considerably older than he really was. Popular ideas despite, there was nothing in the least Bohemian about this young journalist. On the contrary, the precision of his dress, the almost prim formality of his manner, and his general air of quiet reserve, rather suggested the confidential clerk in a business house than the descriptive writer on the staff of a go-ahead paper. However, he had the root of the matter in him all the same—to wit, a natural eye for picturesque detail and a ready pen for the conversion thereof into effective copy. Hitherto he had been chiefly employed in doing smart social sketches, but his editor was now about to try him in a different line.

"Look here, Pillinger," he said, "I'm thinking of utilising your abilities next week in something a bit off your ordinary beat. That is to say, I want you to do us a bank holiday sketch (nothing like being topical)—something crisp, sparkling, and racy—dialogue in the true 'Arry and 'Arriet vein—in short, a little cockney cameo from real life."

"Hardly my style, I am afraid," replied the young man, diffidently; "I don't pretend to any proficiency in cockney dialect——"

"Tut, my dear fellow," interposed the editor, good-humouredly, with a sweeping wave of his large hand; "with your powers of observation and assimilation, you'll pick it up as easy as winking. It's not a matter of having to invent. It's simply a matter of keeping your ears open. The thing's got to be done from the life—I mean, you need simply spend next Monday at some popular holiday resort, mix freely with the hoi polloi, and there you are! Of course, I shall make it worth your while," he added, "and you can charge the office with all expenses incurred."

"Thanks very much. But it's not on those grounds that I feel any hesitation," replied the other, still somewhat reluctantly, "only I know so very little of these matters——"

"All the more reason why you should lose no time in making personal acquaintance with them," interrupted the editor, with good-tempered insistence. "The more versatile you make yourself the better you'll get on. Besides, you've got it in you all right, or else I shouldn't want to put you on to the job. Now where will you go?"

"Wherever you like," replied his subordinate, seeing that further remonstrance was useless. "The Palace, Wembley, the Zoo—I really don't mind in the least."

"Umph!" grunted the editor. "I think if I were you, I'd go somewhere to the seaside—Southend, say, or Margate. Margate, perhaps, for preference. No place like Margate, after all, for seeing 'Arry in his full bank holiday glory. Yes; suppose we decide on Margate."

"Very well. Let it be Margate, then. If I've got to spend my bank holiday out among the riff-raff, I'd as soon do it at Margate as anywhere else," replied young Pillinger, with rather a rueful look.

"Come, man, don't pull that long face," laughed the editor; "I dare say you'll enjoy it when you get there. There's plenty of amusement to be got out of such experiences, if only you enter into the spirit of them."

"That's just what I doubt my capacity for doing," answered Pillinger.

"Rot, my dear fellow," was the editorial rejoinder. "Put on your shabbiest suit, smoke your foulest pipe, throw all Philistine respectability to the winds, and simply let yourself go. You'll find it a novel and far from unpleasing experience. Moreover, you'll thus come back primed to write a really racy and sympathetic sketch. That's what I want. No mere contemptuous description from the point of view of the superior person, but something—damme, what d'ye call the thing—something subjective, from the point of view of the bank holiday-maker himself."

"You mean, you want me to project myself into the mind of 'Arry?"

"Precisely. And of 'Arriet, likewise."

Pillinger smiled: "I doubt if I could project myself into the mind of any woman. Women are not in my line. I don't understand 'em," he rejoined.

"Dare say not. You have never, you see, studied them at close quarters," laughed the editor. "However, perhaps you'll be marrying one of these days, and then you'll get to know more about them."

"I shall never marry; women don't attract me," answered the other, with decision.

The editor merely smiled lazily at this announcement. It was evident he was not sufficiently interested in the matter to care to pursue it.

"Well, about this Margate affair," he said, briskly, coming back to the business in hand. "You will go?"

"Of course, since you wish it; and I'll do my best to turn it into good copy," answered Pillinger.

"All right," nodded the editor, and there the interview terminated.

Young Pillinger returned to his lodgings that Thursday afternoon in rather a grumpy humour. His chief's word was law and had to be obeyed; but it was a confounded nuisance to be required to spend his Easter Monday in so uncongenial a manner. He hated bank holiday-makers and all their ways. The vulgarity and the rowdiness of their orgies—as he styled them—disgusted his refined sensibilities and got on his nerves. Never, if he could avoid it, did he stir out of doors on these periodical festivals of St. Lubbock. Perhaps that was why his prejudice against them was so strong, as prejudices arising from ignorance usually are. Had he seen more of bank holiday crowds at close quarters he might have modified his views on the subject. But relying, as he did, entirely upon either mere hearsay or remote observation from the altitude of his superior pedestal, he had hitherto had no opportunity of rubbing off the corners of his prejudices. This is the necessary result of imperfect personal acquaintance. It is so in every department of existence. For instance, when you meet, in private life, some bitter political opponent whom you have hitherto only known and hated by reputation, you will be sure to find out that he is not half such a bad fellow as you supposed. He only wants knowing and understanding. That is all. Indeed, in the whole dictionary of proverbial maxims, none is truer or sounder than this: "Tout comprendre est tout pardonner." If perfect comprehension does not lead you actually to love your bête noire, it at least leads you to make allowances for him. However, I am telling a story, not preaching a sermon.

But though Pillinger disliked his job, he was too conscientious a journalist not to throw himself into it to the best of his ability. The thing had to be done; and—so far as he could do it—he would do it well and thoroughly. It was in this determination that he entered St. Paul's Station of the S.E. and C.R. early on the morning of Easter Monday and took a third-class excursion ticket to Margate. He might have travelled first for the ordinary third-class fare; but, his object being to get in touch with 'Arry and 'Arriet, he felt it incumbent upon him, though much against his inclination, to submit to such conditions as would insure that result.

The journey down proved hardly so disagreeable as he had expected. It was true the compartment in which he travelled was uncomfortably crowded, having seven on one side and eight on the other. It was true that the atmosphere was rather stuffy with humanity and rank tobacco. It was true that the company was frankly and unashamedly plebeian. But for all this there were compensations in the shape of a constant variety of amusing incidents such as never occur to relieve the decorous tedium of first or second class travel.

You see, these artisans and 'Arries, with their attendant womenfolk, were out for enjoyment, and they didn't mind who knew it. The holiday mood was upon them. Their animal spirits were high, and they gave those spirits full play without making any attempt to disguise them. The loving couples behaved in the most skittish and frolicsome manner. They swapped hats; they exchanged half-sucked bull's-eyes; they chaffed each other, and were chaffed by the assembled company, whom they chaffed back with good-humoured vigour, generally giving quite as good as they got. Pillinger was quite surprised by the readiness of the repartee. It was not, indeed, of the most refined order. But it was spontaneous, racy, humorous, and always to the point. Personalities were freely, though quite good-temperedly, indulged in. And before long our young friend himself—somewhat to his disgust, at first—came in for a share of these facetious attentions.

"Sy, mite," said the man sitting opposite to him, cocking his eye at Pillinger in a waggish manner, "where 'ave yer bin and put yer best gurl—eh, mite?"

Pillinger, much resenting the liberty, bit his lip and affected not to hear the fellow's remark.

"Yer doun't mean ter sy as yer left the pore dear be'ind at 'ome," went on the other, in mocking reproof, "'cos if yer 'ave, yer didn't orter done it—yer didn't reelly, mite."

Pillinger still preserved a frigid silence. By this time the attention of the whole compartment was fixed upon him.

"Hem. He-e-e-e-m. My lord's 'orty to-dy," struck in a pretty, pert, and rather over-dressed factory girl, who sat next to him.

Pillinger flushed, but still not a word.

"P'raps 'is lordship's married—'e looks sad enough," remarked another of the company, "and 'as left 'er lydyship at 'ome to tike care of the noble kids."

"Ho! If that's your ideer of marriage," broke in the speaker's sweetheart, in shrill tones as she pushed him from her, "the sooner you and me turns it up the better."

Here followed a little interlude of reconciliation between the lovers of a nature so amusing that Pillinger could not help laughing, and thus the ice was broken. Before they reached their destination, he was on the best of terms with everybody, and had entered into the spirit of his surroundings to an extent that, at the outset of the journey, he would have deemed impossible.

On getting out at Margate, the rest of the company broke up into twos and threes—mostly twos—and went their several ways. Pillinger was left to saunter down to the front alone. It was an odd thing. Usually he was quite content with his own society. But somehow to-day he felt, for the first time in his life, conscious of a sense of loneliness. Every other man he saw had a companion—usually a female companion, and the way in which they all stared at him, as though they wondered what he was doing by himself, made him quite uncomfortable. Evidently to be out on bank holiday without your "best gurl" (as the man in the train had put it) was to be a marked man. Pillinger did not like exciting remark in this way. He was naturally too retiring for that, and he almost wished now that he had enlisted the services of his sister, or some other female relative, to come down with him and keep him in countenance.

It was while these reflections were passing through his mind that he suddenly heard himself accosted in a refined, feminine voice:

"You here, Mr. Pillinger?"

Pillinger started, looked up, and took off his hat. There, before him, stood Miss Mildred Stacpole, a fresh, good-looking girl, whom he knew in business as one of the staff of the Daily Courier.

"Miss Stacpole—pleased to meet you—unexpected pleasure," he stammered, in the nervous, disjointed way into which this shy young man always fell when first embarking on conversation with any member of the fair sex.

"Thanks," she rejoined, smiling; "but do you know—social amenities apart—I'm really awfully glad to meet you. I'm down here doing 'Bank Holiday Humours' for the Courier. And though, of course, I'm well enough used by this time to going about alone in all sorts of places—well, I've never in my life been stared at as I've been stared at since I came down here to-day. The loving couples—if I read their looks aright—seem to regard me as a strange sort of beast for being unaccompanied, while the unattached men I've met appear, for the most part, to infer that I'm of the 'come-and-kiss-me-somebody' type of young woman. Indeed, one or two of them have been most offensively rude in trying to force themselves upon me, and I've had the greatest difficulty in escaping from them. I do not know whether your engagements allow of it. But if so, I should feel really grateful if you could take me under your wing for awhile, Mr. Pillinger."

"Of course—of course," he answered, hastily, "with all the pleasure in life."

He could have said no less even if the favour requested had been ever so distasteful to him. But averse though he usually was to feminine society, to-day, somehow, the prospect of a lady's companionship appeared by no means unwelcome, for reasons which have been already indicated. So the pleasure he expressed in falling in with Miss Stacpole's suggestion was, for once in a way, no mere polite formality.

"What are you doing down here, Mr. Pillinger?" inquired his companion, as they strolled away together in the direction of the Jetty.

"I'm on the same errand as yourself. My editor wants a realistic bank holiday sketch for this week's issue," he replied.

"Have you picked up any useful material for copy yet?" she asked.

"Well, I think I've mastered the cockney accent, more or less," he answered; "I had plenty of opportunity for that in the train coming down, and I've also picked up some good samples of racy chaff. By the way, it's really astonishing how ready these fellows are in their repartee—and the girls, too, for that matter."

It was noticeable how, the moment the conversation began to turn on his professional business, all young Pillinger's shyness vanished. He talked—as he always could talk about that—with complete absence of self-consciousness.

Miss Stacpole nodded.

"Yes," she said, "there's a natural humour about most of these cockneys, combined with a pungent crispness of expression, that is, in its way, quite unique. Even those impertinent young men who tried to scrape acquaintance with me just now—well, angry as I was, I could hardly help laughing at the things they said. They were all so pleased with themselves, too, and seemed to regard it so entirely as a matter of course that an unescorted girl like myself should jump at their advances. And their astonishment when I would have nothing to say to them was downright ludicrous."

"I can believe it," said Pillinger. "These good people seem to regard bank holiday as a sort of special occasion for the pairing of the sexes. In the carriage, coming down, I was, so to speak, the only odd man out, and finely I got chaffed about the absence of my 'best gurl' (as they phrased it) I can assure you."

"Yes, awfully absurd, isn't it?" laughed Miss Stacpole, "as though hunting in loving couples was the one and only way to enjoy a holiday outing. Ah! I have it. Bright idea! I've suddenly thought of a good catch-title for my article—'Among the Amorous.' How does that strike you, Mr. Pillinger?"

"It strikes me as highly appropriate," he answered. "Amorousness is evidently the key of the bank holiday situation."

Miss Stacpole made no immediate reply. She was busy at the moment jotting down headings for an article in her pocket-book.

They strolled about, mingling with and taking stock of the crowds, for an hour or more. Then the voice of the inner man began to make itself heard, and Pillinger suggested that they should adjourn to a restaurant for lunch. Miss Stacpole, who had visited Margate before, knew of a good Italian place not far from the front, and thither they repaired. The restaurant was pretty full up, but they managed to find a couple of seats, and Pillinger gave his orders to the waiter. The viands were good; the champagne was—let us say inspiring; and Miss Stacpole was capital company. Under the combined influence of it all, young Pillinger began to feel unwontedly genial. However, in the course of luncheon, an embarrassing incident occurred that rendered him rather uncomfortable.

The man who had chaffed him in the train happened to enter the restaurant with his sweetheart on his arm. While looking about for seats, he espied young Pillinger lunching with Miss Stacpole, and up he went to him and tapped him playfully on the shoulder.

"What ho! mite," he said, with a facetious wink, "so yer 'ad got a best gurl up yer sleeve arter orl? Oh yer sly dawg!"

Pillinger flushed crimson to the roots of his hair. Miss Stacpole, who had not failed to hear what was said, also looked rather uncomfortable.

"Is that one of your friends in the train?" she asked, when the man had gone, by way of breaking the awkward silence that had intervened.

"Yes—impertinent jacknanapes!" muttered the blushing and annoyed Pillinger.

"Well, he knew no better. I don't suppose he meant any offence," said Miss Stacpole, whom a good luncheon had evidently rendered more than usually indulgent in her views on things in general.

Young Pillinger muttered something unintelligible, and drank off a whole glass of champagne.

Presently they left the restaurant, and, after promenading awhile upon the jetty, they descended to the sands—the tide being then low—and sauntered along in the direction of the North Foreland. As they went, they passed numbers of amorous couples, sitting in sheltered nooks under the cliffs and caressing each other, with serene indifference to observation, as the proletariate do.

"It is really very remarkable" commented Miss Stacpole, "how openly these lower orders make love! They do not appear in the least ashamed of being seen kissing—the girls no more than the men."

"No. Their ideas on the subject are decidedly elementary," replied young Pillinger. "Though, when you come to look at the question dispassionately—apart from conventional prejudice—" he added, in moralising vein, "why should they be ashamed of it? Kissing between lovers is, after all, a very natural and harmless amusement, I suppose—for those who like it."

Miss Stacpole smiled.

"Since when has Saul taken his place among the prophets?" she inquired, mischievously.

"I don't quite spot the allusion," replied young Pillinger.

"I mean, it strikes me as rather odd to hear a man who in his writings is so down on lovers and all their ways defend the practice of kissing," she explained.

"Well, it is not in my line, I admit," he answered, "but I would not grudge so innocent a diversion to those to whom it appeals."

"I see," said Miss Stacpole.

"Besides," went on young Pillinger, "on bank holiday, don't you know, one somehow takes a broader and more indulgent view of these things."

"Oh! Does one?" queried Miss Stacpole. "And why, I wonder?"

"Don't know. The holiday fever, I suppose. But, I say, let me give you a hand over these boulders, Miss Stacpole."

The boulders which they had now begun to cross were slimy with seaweed, and the lady gladly availed herself of her companion's proffered hand. Presently she slipped, and would have fallen had not young Pillinger caught her in his arms. He had never held a pretty girl in his arms before, and the effect of it, reinforced by the bank holiday fever, was sudden and electrical. You know what shy men are—very much like faulty soda-water siphons. It takes a deuce of a lot to get them started. But when you do get them started, they go it with a vengeance. So now: young Pillinger went it. To be explicit, he audaciously kissed Miss Stacpole.

"Mr. Pillinger," cried the lady, "I'm amazed at you."

"I'm awfully sorry," he answered, apologetically, "but I really couldn't help it. I hope you are not frightfully angry——"

"Not so much angry," she broke in, "as astonished. You said just now that this sort of thing wasn't at all in your line."

"Nor was it until this moment. I succumbed to a sudden temptation. And—well, you see, after all, as I said just now, kissing is a very harmless amusement for those who like it."

"Yes, for those who like it," she murmured, with downcast eyes.

"And don't you like it?" he insisted, with earnest audacity.

Miss Stacpole lifted her eyes to his. She said nothing. But the glance was eloquent. It said more plainly than any words:

"Yes, I do like it very much."

It also spoke in the imperative, as well as in the indicative mood. It said:

"Do it again"—which young Pillinger promptly did.

Over the events and conversation of the next hour I will draw a kindly veil. A journalist myself, I will not give away the weaker moments of a brother and a sister journalist. Besides, those who have been through the critical stage of courting will easily fill in the hiatus for themselves. And those who have not—well, let them wait until they do—that's all; and then they will understand why the conversations of newly-engaged couples are, simply on intellectual grounds, unfit for publication. . . . . .

Young Pillinger duly produced his bank holiday sketch to his editor, which the latter pronounced to be quite good.

"But, hang it all, my dear fellow," he said, "don't you think you've given us rather too much love?"

"Not a bit," replied young Pillinger stoutly; "love is the key of the bank holiday situation."

"Hulloa!" exclaimed the editor, "I seem to have come across that phrase before. Yes! I remember now. It was in a bank holiday article I saw yesterday in the Weekly Courier."

Young Pillinger blushed furiously.

"Yes," he blurted out, "it was Mildred Stacpole's article. She went to Margate on the same business as I did. And I met her there, and—and—we're engaged."

"So ho! That's it, is it?" ejaculated the editor, beaming on him, kindly. "Well, I congratulate you, my dear fellow. Mildred Stacpole's a real good sort ——"

"You know her, then?"

"Quite well. She's a sort of relation of my wife's."

There was something in the editor's look and tone, as he made this announcement, that made young Pillinger exclaim, suddenly:

"What! you knew all along that Milly was going to be at Margate on Easter Monday?"

"Precisely; and, being aware that love—to use your own phrase—is the key of the bank holiday situation," said the editor, genially, "I sent you there on purpose to give you the opportunity of turning the key in the lock."

ART NOTES.

IF any of those who make a habit of looking at modern pictures still preserve belief in the existence of a place where the isms cease from troubling and the painters are at rest, they may certainly instance the exhibitions of the R.I. as affording grounds for the faith that is in them. I never enter them without a feeling of reverence for their cloistered calm creeping over me—without an instinctive desire to take off my hat, even though I may be already holding it in my hand. There are no iconoclasts here, no furiously raging heathen—everything is quiet, calm, solemn, even a little dull. These Royal Water-Colour painters deserve their title of honour; they are as Royal as the Bourbons; like that exalted race, they have forgotten nothing, and not learned much, of what has been passing in the outer world during the last quarter-century or so. There is not a picture that annoys you, not one that excites you, scarcely one that interests you. You can go away and get your tea with a quiet mind, and without a headache—ten minutes after you have left the galleries it will be to you as though the pictures had never been. Or if you think of them at all, it is in a peaceful reverie in which you distinguish none individually, but have a vaguely pleasant recollection of innumerable little landscapes, and little domestic scenes, and little portraits, all very neat and nicely coloured, and every bit as good as you would find in the best of Christmas Numbers or the highest type of chromo-lithograph.

We ought to be very thankful that such a peaceful institute can exist and flourish even in these ruthless days, especially those of us who, through pressure of business in the outer world, have not had time to come to any very decided opinion about our preferences in art. If we want to buy a picture—and to be hailed as a patron of the Fine Arts is a very worthy ambition indeed—we know that we can go to the R.I. and satisfy the craving at a very moderate figure, being absolutely certain the while that we are not making fools of ourselves. We could enter the gallery blindfold—if the custodians would allow us to do so—turn round three times in the middle (avoiding the settees), and choose the first picture our extended hands should touch, secure in the conviction that it would be an ornament to our drawing-room. I do not believe there is another gallery in Europe of which the same could be said with such confidence.

Of course, there is the R.S.B.A. in Suffolk-street, which has also about it a faint suspicion of incense. But I am very much afraid that the R.S.B.A. has been waking up recently. There are quite a number of paintings there at this moment that insist upon being looked at. They are nearly all landscapes, it is true; and if we confined our blind-man's buff experiment to the subject pictures, we should still be reasonably safe. But if, when we removed the handkerchief, we discovered that we had run up against Mr. F. F. Foottet's "Passing of Spring," I think we should get rather a shock to our nervous systems. It is such a pale, anæmic picture, for one thing, that looks as if it had been "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"—perhaps through sitting up all night composing spring poetry. And as you look at it it wobbles—or, more exactly speaking, its component parts wobble—chiefly because it is all arbitrary blobs of pale paint. As the poet has happily remarked, "I know it's very clever, but I do not understand it," and I am quite sure that it would make the furniture in the ordinary suburban drawing-room feel extremely uncomfortable. In fact, I believe the only way to make it seem quite at home would be to build a pale purple drawing-room on purpose for it, and most of us could not afford that. I think we should be wiser to confine our game of touch-picture to the four end galleries. Those on the north contain the water-colours—little ones, most of them—and almost without exception quite innocuous The South-East and South-West Galleries contain oil pictures, and, for some reason which I cannot fathom, appear to be intended by those in authority as dust-heaps or last refuges for the destitute. I can scarcely believe, that is to say, that the fact that all the best and most interesting pictures are hung in the Central Gallery is altogether due to chance. However it be, were I an exhibitor I should certainly feel the reverse of complimented were my picture hung in one of those secondary rooms in which are collected nearly all the canvases which are neither good nor interesting. Not, of course, that I should blame the Hanging Committee, who are quite right to put the best face possible on to their show by hanging as many good pictures as possible in the most prominent position.

One of the minor features of the show which interests me is the fact that nearly all the most notable landscapes deal with wintry scenes. Certainly Mr. Tom Robertson's "Haven Under the Hill" does not, and were I a millionaire, it is the painting which I should choose to buy and live with with the most confidence. But Mr. East, and Mr. Walter Fowler, and Mr. W. J. Laidlay, and Mr. W. Elmer Schofield, each show a fine and important landscape, and there is not a leaf—unless it be an evergreen—among the four of them, only grey skies, and mud, and snow. Are we becoming a nation of pessimists, or is it that Nature's blue skies and flowers have come to be classed among the efforts of the "pretty-pretty" school, and, accordingly, looked down upon?

Among the many minor shows which are being held at the present time there are two which appeal to me particularly. One is of works by Mr. Wm. Rothenstein. I like Mr. Rothenstein's paintings very much, and admire those which are now at the Carfax Gallery, although they are of the slightest. But what chiefly arouses my admiration is the keen common-sense which has brought them together while the compliment paid to Mr. Rothenstein by the inclusion of one of his paintings in the national collection is still fresh in the memory. It shows an appreciation of the virtues of topicality—an ability to strike while the iron is hot, and an understanding of how to make hay while the sun shines, such as is rarely to be found among the organisers of "one-man" shows.

The other is of water-colours and pastels of Constantinople, by Mr. Warwick Goble, at the Brook-street Gallery. I admire it because, in the first place, Mr. Goble is an extremely clever painter, an able draughtsman, and with a keen eye for fine colour; and in the second, because he has chosen such a fascinating and unhackneyed theme. Even were Mr. Goble's paintings a great deal less attractive than they are, I would much rather possess one of them, dealing, say, with the Galata Bridge or the view of Stamboul from Eyoub, than an equally good painting of some such worn-out scene as is painted by the hundred yearly in Brittany or Normandy or Scotland, or the rest of the stock artist's paradises.

If any temptation to take Bovril on any occasion were needed, it would surely be found in the engravings which its proprietors offer their customers. The latest is a reproduction of Mr. Arthur J. Elsey's Academy picture, "A Tempting Bait," by Messrs. C. W. Faulkner and Co. There is a double significance in the title.

Mr. Herbert Sedcole's mezzotint engraving from Mr. Joseph Farquharson's Academy picture, "Homewards," which Messrs. Frost and Reed have just added to their list of publications, should prove exceedingly popular. It is a very finely finished piece of work.

MUSIC.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR CONDUCTING.

CAN conducting be taught? That is a rather interesting question which has been raised by Miss Fanny Davies' suggestion that a conducting scholarship or exhibition should be founded at the Royal Academy and Royal College to perpetuate the memory of Sir August Manns. One knows, of course, that all of the more famous existing practitioners of the art have been their own teachers. The well-known remark ascribed to Herr Mottl on the subject may be recalled in this connection. Asked the best way to learn the art, his reply was engagingly simple: "You go up to the desk, and if you can do it—why, you can." (Wenn man 's kann, kann man 's.) There is much virtue in an if, and not less certainly here than elsewhere. Also bearing on the point is the story told in relation to the first performance directed by another eminent master of the craft, to wit, the late Herr Levi. When he was a boy of sixteen in the gymnasium at Mannheim he was studying music under Vincenz Lachner, who was conductor at the opera. One Sunday afternoon Lachner fell ill, and the sub-conductor was ill, too. So they sent for Levi, and Lachner asked him did he dare to undertake the job.. And Levi answered: "Ja." And that night, without rehearsal, he conducted Halévy's "La Juive," and did it wonderfully well—which goes to show that whether conductors can be made or not, some are certainly born. This was the view of the late Anton Seidl, who once expressed the opinion that conductors are of two kinds—those who can conduct by the grace of God, and time-beaters. On the same occasion he explained that he gained his earliest operatic training himself by wheeling Lilli Lehmann about as one of the Rhine daughters at Bayreuth in 1876, and doubtless such training was excellent both from the musical and muscular point of view, and contributed in due measure to Mr. Seidl's eventual distinction.

Unfortunately, recourse to such heroic methods is not always practicable, and it remains to consider how far our native students would be likely to benefit from instruction of a more hum-drum order, though it would, of course, be a mistake to assume that such instruction is not given up to a point already. Alike at the Royal Academy and the Royal College, opportunities of trying their hands with the bâton are, I believe, afforded already to the more advanced students, even though conducting, as such, may not actually rank as a "subject" in the recognised curriculum. If, however, Miss Fanny Davies' suggestion be adopted, the art of using what Richter once described as the most difficult instrument in the orchestra would no doubt be more systematically cultivated, and without supposing that Weingartners and Mahlers would be turned out forthwith by the dozen, there seems no reason to think that benefit would not result. Those inclined to scoff at the notion may at all events be reminded that a master no less eminent than Nikisch has for some time past directed such a class at Leipzig—to which it may be added as bearing very pertinently on the point at issue, that one of his most talented pupils has been, according to report, a young Englishman named Coates, who has, indeed, done so well under Nikisch's tuition that he has, it is said, recently been appointed principal conductor of the opera at Elberfeld. Nikisch's system of teaching is, we are told, simplicity itself. His pupils are prepared for him by Hans Sitt, once the distinguished viola player in the Brodsky Quartet in Leipzig, who takes them through a course of score reading. When sufficiently proficient in this, the pupils take up the bâton and direct their version of a score they have studied, the orchestra being composed of picked pupils in the Conservatoire. At first Herr Nikisch restricts his attention to the physical manner of his pupils, behind whom he stands, and any signs of exuberance are at once checked. Advice as to the time, accent, and other matters is tendered when asked for, but everything is done that can be done by the Professor to make his pupils independent, induce originality of thought, and promote self-confidence. It must be rather trying to conduct the "Pathetic" symphony, say, with Nikisch standing behind one, but excellent training no doubt.

In the case of our British students, a preliminary task of some difficulty would be to find a native Nikisch to undertake their tuition. At present it must be recorded with sorrow such a one has not disclosed himself. Obviously, however, it would be the precise object of the Manns scholarship to bring him to light so that too much need not be said on this point. A more difficult question arises when it is asked what orchestras our budding Richters and incipient Safonoffs might be expected to conduct when their talents have been revealed. Unhappily the field is sadly limited, and it is this circumstance, of course, which goes to account for the fact that hitherto we have produced so few conductors of note. You cannot make omelettes without breaking eggs or learn to swim without entering the water. But for the happy chance which gave him his opportunity when the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts were started, Mr. H. J. Wood would probably have been engaged in the teaching of singing at the present day. Apart from such openings, which occur once in a blue moon, the average young musician who feels that he has a gift for conducting can only demonstrate his powers by giving concerts at his own expense, and this is a somewhat unremunerative way of going to work. Where the opportunity has offered the right man has seldom failed to appear. Mr. Riseley, at Bristol, for instance, is a choral conductor of the first class, and it is hardly necessary to recall the achievements under the same head of Dr. Coward at Sheffield. Other orchestral conductors who have done excellent work beside Mr. Wood include, of course, Dr. Cowen, as well as Mr. Landon Ronald (whose talents in this direction are quite exceptional), Mr. Charles Williams, Mr. W. H. Thorley, Mr. Thomas Beecham, and others. Given proper opportunities, we should soon have conductors; but without these it is to be feared that no amount of scholarships or exhibitions would be likely to bring them into being.

Save for those on Good Friday and Sunday there will be no more concerts now till some time after Easter. As regards those recently given, the London Symphony Orchestra brought their Richter series to a close on Monday with one composed of entirely familiar works and Mme. Agnes Nicholls as vocalist. Last week a performance of some interest was that of an unfamiliar quintet for piano and strings by Gabriel Faure, which was introduced by Quatuor Capet, with Mlle. Marguérite Long at the piano, at the Broadwood concert. It proved a refined and scholarly work, but probably few of its hearers experienced any violent desire to hear it again. At the last Chappell Ballad Concert of the present season on Saturday there was the usual array of popular artists, among whom no one seemed to make a greater success than Miss Margaret Cooper, who has won great favour during the past season. A new pianist of considerable promise heard earlier in the week was Miss Janet Wheeler, whose recital at the Æolian Hall impressed her hearers most favourably. She should certainly be heard of again. A successful début was also made by another young native artist, Miss Gwendoline Pelly, an accomplished violinist. Another new violinist heard was M. Oskar Back, an artist possessed of brilliant technique and a cultivated style.

In connection with the new concert hall which it is proposed to build in Great Portland-street, an important step has been taken by the leading concert agents, who have entered into a common undertaking, to which they have pledged themselves to adhere by a signed agreement, not to book any engagements at the hall so long as it remains under the management of the firm at present associated with it. The reason assigned for this step in the letter which has been addressed to the firm in question is, I understand, the undesirability of the management of a hall of this kind being entrusted to those engaged themselves in the concert agency business; and it is, of course, sufficiently obvious that such an arrangement would hardly be likely to work satisfactorily. Among those who have signed the undertaking are, I understand, Messrs. N. Vert, Concert Director E. L. Robinson, Mr. Daniel Mayer, Mr. Leslie Hibberd, Mr. L. G. Sharpe, Messrs. Ibbs and Tillett, in fact, all the best known agents. Future developments will be awaited with interest.

The list of artists who are giving their services on the occasion of the Santley Jubilee concert at the Albert Hall on May 1 may be said to represent all quarters of the globe. Thus Mme. Albani hails from Canada, Mme. Suzanne Adams from the United States, Mme. Ada Crossley from Australia, Mr. Ben Davies from Wales, M. Hollman from France, Herr Kreisler from Austria, and M. Edouard de Reszke from Poland, while Mme. Clara Butt, Mme. Kirkby Lunn, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford, together with Mr. Santley himself, will stand for the old country. During the interval a presentation will be made to the hero of the occasion in the shape of a cheque representing the subscriptions of his numberless friends and admirers.

Three vocal recitals whose programmes are quite off the beaten track are announced by that excellent singer, Miss Grainger-Kerr, for the afternoons of April 24, April 29, and May 6, at Messrs. Broadwood's rooms. The first of these will be devoted to works by Granville Bantock, Havergal Brian, Debussy, and Weingartner; the second to MacDowell, Bertram Shapleigh, and Katherine Ruth Heymann; and the third to Norman O'Neill, Stojowski, Cyril Scott, Jan Sibelius, Emil Sjogren, Coleridge-Taylor, Max Reger, and Weingartner. Miss Grainger-Kerr will be assisted by Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Gregory Hast, and Mr. Frederic Austin.

The news that Karl Goldmark has now finished his opera based on "A Winter's Tale," which will be produced in Vienna in the autumn, reminds one of a composer whose works have so far been ignored at Covent Garden. Yet his "Queen of Sheba," "Cricket on the Hearth," and other operas, have enjoyed much favour on the Continent, and are known to all musicians. The former work there has, indeed, been talk of producing at Covent Garden more than once, but the absurd rule against Biblical subjects has stood in the way, especially as I believe that the composer objected, when the matter was under discussion, to any alteration of the title of the work for the purpose of getting round the difficulty, after the manner in which it was circumvented in the case of Massenet's "Hérodiade." His "Rustic Wedding" symphony, the "Sakuntala" overture, and his violin suite, are the instrumental compositions by which Goldmark, who is now getting an old man, has been best known to English audiences. But these are only a few of the many works in every form which he has produced.

That seems to be a capital plan which Mr. Charles Manners has adopted in connection with Moody-Manners provincial performances of getting amateur operatic societies, when such exist in the various cities which he visits, to co-operate with his company. In Dublin, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere it appears the scheme has been successfully tried, and now it is to be resorted to again in connection with the forthcoming special "opera week" which Mr. Manners is giving once more at Sheffield. These local operatic societies, we are told, have an average membership of between fifty and seventy members, who pay a local conductor £1 per head, for which they are taught the choruses of various operas, and so enthusiastic are they seemingly that they frequently travel from one town to another to have the benefit of practical stage experience under Mr. Manners, who, in his turn, is naturally delighted to have such useful auxiliaries. It really seems a most excellent arrangement. After all, why should local choral bodies confine their attention exclusively to goody-goody oratorios and wishy-washy cantatas. It is easy enough to understand, at all events, that many find operatic music, especially when combined with the excitement of actual stage performances, a pleasant change, while it is hardly necessary to point out that singers so trained might prove invaluable eventually when English opera is better established than at present.

Is the variation form played out? According to some the answer must be, as they say in Parliament, in the affirmative. Thus one writer tells us that "the form is bound to be a somewhat stiff and cold one, for it is simply a kind of grid on which we place boxes containing emotions all duly sorted and marked." The similitude is, perhaps, more novel than convincing. Certainly it would require very powerful argument to persuade one that a form which includes such masterpieces as the immortal examples left by Beethoven and Schubert, to name no others, is necessarily "stiff and cold." As a matter of fact there is not the slightest sign that the variation form is losing favour in the least degree, even with the most "advanced" composers. Reger's partiality for it is well known, one of Strauss's most famous works consists of "Variations on a Knightly theme" ("Don Quixote"), Elgar has done nothing better than his Orchestral Variations, which have carried his fame to the end of the musical earth, and other cases could be cited. Nor is there anything surprising in this. After all, what is most good music but variations?

The particular variations which have given rise to the remarks above quoted are those of M. Paderewski, recently published as his Op. 23. Paderewski has not written a great amount, though enough to stimulate warm admiration on the part of many who have wished that he would write more. Was it not Mr. H. T. Finck who, always independent, once declared that some of his smallest compositions were of greater value than all the works of Brahms. That was, perhaps, slightly exceeding the mark, but there is no doubt that Paderewski has written some very charming music. Such are his Polish fantasie for orchestra and piano and his pianoforte concerto, and among smaller pieces his well-known minuet—all full of melody and grace—while there must not be forgotten in the same connection his opera "Manru," which was performed with success some years ago at Dresden. This is a work which Sir Augustus Harris thought at one time of producing at Covent Garden, but the composer declined to make certain alterations which were suggested, and the idea was dropped. The fact that the work is no longer given may or may not go to indicate its worth. Some of the music was done, it may be remembered, at the Crystal Palace a few years ago, when it made quite a pleasing impression.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Mr. Harry De Windt's "Through Savage Europe" (1) amply justifies its paradoxical title. Hardly had he reached Cettinge, the capital of Montenegro, when he heard a shot in the market-place, saw a corpse carried past him, and was told by an unconcerned bystander, "It's only a family feud. It was not murder, for the victim carried arms, and was fool enough to make no use of them." "And his assailant?" "Oh nothing will happen to him; this often happens here,' replied my informant, with a smile and a shrug. When street boys quarrel in Cettinge, the most monstrous charge they can hurl at each other—and it is occasionally and shamefully true—is, 'Your grandfather died in his bed!'" Throughout the Russo-Turkish campaign but one Montenegrin prisoner was taken out of more than 6,000 slain! Nevertheless, the Montenegrin is the best fellow in the world.

I have never (writes Mr. De Windt), in all my wanderings throughout the world, met a better fellow than the Montenegrin, who seems absolutely free from the petty meannesses which often characterise natives of the further East. He has been called the "Afghan of Europe," and if the Afghan be as brave as a lion, generous in his dealings, and the soul of honour, the comparison is correct.

On the other hand, the Servian seems a swine. The account Mr. De Windt gives of the murders of King Alexandra and Queen Draga, derived from the murderers themselves, and especially from a general officer who was the first to break into the chamber where the assassinations were committed, is revolting. Indeed, one of the leading murderers, Captain Nikolai Rastovitch, who seemed to Mr. De Windt to have "the courtier's, soldier's, scholar's eye, tongue, sword," and "to be the glass of fashion and the mould of form" in Belgrade, "had shamefully mutilated Queen Draga under such conditions as would have repelled the most degraded ruffian in the East End of London." Yet he was neither the highest in rank nor the lowest in brutality of the assassins. Here Queen Draga's brother-in-law, Colonel Maschin, the prime mover of the conspiracy, bears the palm. He had the murdered and abominably mutilated body of the Queen exposed to the public gaze on the day before her interment, tricked out in a gay pink ball-gown, while she and the king were carted off in the prison tumbril, used for the conveyance of dead criminals, to be buried in the pauper graveyard. Even here the vindictive Colonel showed a petty and disgusting spite:—

No friends or relatives of the dead were permitted to attend the funeral, and floral offerings were strictly forbidden, though a tiny wreath of withered azaleas had been secretly placed there since by an unknown hand. Two black wooden crosses leaning carelessly against the wall, and bearing the names "Alexander Obrenovitch" and "Draga Obrenovitch," roughly scrawled in white chalk, mark the spot. The crosses stand side by side, but half a dozen other graves separate the remains of the King and Queen. "She shall not have even that satisfaction," Maschin is reported to have said.

Before quitting the Balkans I should like to quote for you Mr. De Windt's testimony to Austrian efficiency as colonisers and civilisers. Mr. Gladstone said once that "no man could put his finger on the map of Europe and find a place where Austria had done good;" a reproach which the Austrian Balkans alone refutes.

While travelling, writes Mr. De Windt, from Ragusa to the Servian Frontier I met in every town or village with some fresh and wonderful proof that the Austrians (generally regarded as a stay-at-home nation) are really the finest and quickest colonisers in the world—excelling not only in the administration of State affairs under novel and complicated conditions, but also in that close attention to details which affects even the personal comfort of travellers.

Your impression of Russia, on the other hand, will certainly not be modified by anything Mr. De Windt has to tell you of that distracted country. Not the least characteristic, perhaps, of Mr. De Windt's experiences of Russia is that of the sudden pull-up and its cause of a train from Batoum to Baku.

"Something wrong?" asked Mr. De Windt of a fellow-passenger. "Oh, dear, no! We are only killing time to suit the timetable. You see this tunnel, recently made, cuts off a long détour round a range of hills, and we have to pull up at it for twenty minutes to fit in with the scheduled time."

The suggestion that the scheduled time might be changed to suit the short cut seemed to his Russian friend revolutionary. Not less characteristic of the Russia of to-day is the frightful slaughter in Warsaw of men, women, and little children. Mr. De Windt saw the bodies of some of the victims, "shockingly disfigured, having been clubbed to death with the butt-ends of rifles, though many of the women, having been shot in the back while trying to reach a place of safety, had no visible wounds. Both sexes were stripped to the waist, their upper garments being rolled across the hips." Amongst the corpses was that of a slim, fair-haired, pretty little girl of sixteen. "They got her in the back while she was running away," remarked the corporal in charge. I hope what I have said of "Through Savage Europe" will suggest to you the extreme interest of the volume. To transport you to savage Europe of to-day is incomparably easier than to transport you, as with Hans Andersen's goloshes of happiness, to savage England of the days of bluff King Hal; but this in his "Privy Seal" (2) Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has done. The very style of the story—which has to do chiefly with Thomas Cromwell's plots and the counter-plots which brought him to the block—through its Saxon vigour and old-world quaintness helps to transport you to those dread times. One thing even Mr. Hueffer has not done, and could not do—though he has had the courage to attempt it—reverse the impression left too deeply upon you by history of the characters of Anne of Cleves and of Catherine Howard. On the other hand, nothing could be more vivid or veracious than the impressions left upon you of the characters of Henry and Thomas Cromwell.

The inmates of Mrs. Fred Reynolds's "The House of Rest" (3)—a home for "decayed" gentlefolk established by a lady who had learned sympathy with poverty through bitter experience of its miseries—hardly interest you, while they distract you from the fortunes of the lady bountiful herself, which you would have preferred to follow. That they should end as happily as they do is a surprise as well as a pleasure to you, since at the opening of the story you are assured that its hero "had laid down his life valiantly in his country's cause in far Thibet." Nevertheless, he turns up as one of the "decayed" inmates of the House of Rest to recover there his lost memory and with it his lost love. The contrast between the fates of the two gutter-born girls, Yan and Littl'un, in Miss Colmore's "The Angel and the Outcast" (4) is as powerful and poignant as it is suggestive. It would be almost too painful but for the redeeming love of Yan, who gives her life in an effort to save from ruin her idolised sister, Littl'un. Most novel readers, I fancy, would have wished that the outcast on her deathbed had been identified and ministered to by the angel; but this would have somewhat lessened the powerful impression left upon you at the tragic close of the story of Yan's self-effacing and redeeming love. The sordidness of London East-End life is painted with a painful vividness in this striking and suggestive novel. You ought to read Mr. Armiger Barclay's "The Kingmakers" (5) after laying down "Through Savage Europe," since you are probably intended to read "Servia" for the "Sergia" of the novel, while the rival kings seem to have been suggested by Alexander and Peter. However, the story, which has to do with rival loves as well as rival kings, is stirring and interesting, while its plot is certainly ingenious.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

By way of relief from the worry of Transvaal politics and the troublesome question of Chinese labour, Sir Percy Fitzpatrick has written "Jock of the Bushveld." It is "the story of a dog," and the book will be published by Messrs. Longmans.

President Roosevelt is a man of many accomplishments, and among the rest he is a delightful writer on big game hunting and field-lore. Under the title of "Good Hunting," Messrs. Harper and Brothers have just published a volume (price 3s. 6d.) containing a collection of papers by the President, in which he gives an account of some of his sporting expeditions in bygone years. The book has a number of illustrations.

Last September a deputation from the Eighty Club paid a visit to Hungary on the invitation of the Independent Club of Budapest, an organisation occupying a place in Hungarian politics similar to that of the Eighty Club in this country. As an outcome of that visit, which attracted much attention at the time, a volume entitled "Hungary; Its People, Places, and Politics," the work of various members of the deputation, has just been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, price 10s. 6d. The book, as may be gathered from the title, is not entirely occupied with politics, or a mere formal record of the deputation's experiences. Mr. Oscar Browning writes on "Education in Budapest," and there are chapters on excursions to the Carpathians and the Iron Gate of the Danube; on hunting, sporting, and fishing, agriculture, and horse-breeding in Hungary. It is, indeed, an instructive work on the country and its people, and its interest is enhanced by numerous illustrations.

"The Pocket Charles Kingsley" has now been added to Messrs. Chatto and Windus's popular series of little volumes (price 2s. each), containing selected passages from the books of well-known authors. The extracts have been chosen by Mr. Alfred H. Hyatt from Kingsley's works as novelist, poet, essayist, and preacher.

"A Hunting Catechism" (Arnold, 3s. 6d. net) is another little book from the pen of Colonel R. F. Meysey-Thompson, on the same lines as his previously published "catechisms" on fishing and shooting.

"Kerry" is the subject and Captain C. P. Crane the author of the latest volume in Messrs. Methuen's series of "Little Guides" (price 2s. 6d. net). Captain Crane gives an admirable descriptive and historical account of that most picturesque and interesting county, and his book—which is provided with a map and many illustrations from photographs—should be in the hands of every tourist visiting Kerry.

Mr. Thomas W. Lawson's novel, "Friday the 13th" (Heinemann, 4s. net), is as melodramatic as the page-advertisements with which he boomed it in the daily papers last week. It exhibits the author of "Frenzied Finance" himself more frenzied than ever in his denunciations of "the Dirty Dollar army," the "human hyenas," the "hell-hounds," etc., of the New York Stock Exchange. The purpose of the book need not be discussed here, but as a sensational story of stock-gambling it is undeniably effective.

Early in April Messrs. Sisley will publish a new book by the Rev. Evelyn Burnaby, entitled "Memories of Famous Trials at the Old Bailey." The book, which makes an opportune appearance just as the Old Bailey has given place to the new court, will be dedicated to the author's old friend, the Lord Chief Justice. Mr. Evelyn Burnaby is a brother of the late Colonel Fred Burnaby.

Messrs. A. and C. Black will shortly publish "The Savage South Seas," a book written by Mr. E. Way Elkington, and illustrated in colours from pictures by Mr. Norman Hardy.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has issued a new edition (price 6s.) of Signor Fogazzaro's novel, "The Woman (Malombra)," translated from the Italian by F. Thorold Dickson. Since its first appearance the translation has been revised, and in its present form this powerful story by the author of "The Saint" should make a wider appeal to English readers.

"The Clergy List for 1907" has been issued by Kelly's Directories, Limited. Now in its sixty-fifth year of publication, this well-known work has always enjoyed a high reputation, alike for the accuracy of its information and the convenience of its arrangement for purposes of reference.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—What are you going to do with yourself at Easter? Frolic over to France? Romp off to Rome? Or quietly stay at home? Each has its charms, but the first two have the disadvantage of being what everyone else is doing. Crowded trains and boats are very disagreeable things—especially the boats— and besides, when we do what the masses do, we sink our individuality for the time being, and become merely molecules. This is surely unworthy of intelligent beings such as you and I!

The chief reason for leaving home is that one may the better enjoy coming back to it. Home is the place we have so studiously suited to our own needs that it fits us like an outer envelope. In no other house do we feel so absolutely ourselves; and of all the delightful things that devoted persons have done to please another, that which (it is said) King Edward did for his bride is the most charming. I refer to his fitting up for the beautiful Danish Princess a boudoir exactly like the one that was her "den" in her girlhood's home. Jim imitated his Majesty when he brought home his Irish bride, and she has often told us what a delightful surprise it was when, getting back from her honeymoon, she found her own little sitting-room almost exactly reproduced, even to the pictures on the walls, the books on the shelves, and the patterns of the chintz. Her mother had conspired with Jim and hatched a most successful plot.

Home means much of our mental atmosphere. When the Burdons were burnt out of their house two years ago (all for the want of a properly organised system of fire appliances), they were all three as restless and uncomfortable as a wretched hen that cannot get to her nest. When they were rebuilding, the architect suggested some alterations (to do this appears to be a duty that an architect owes himself!), but the Burdons were quite firm in insisting that the rooms should be exactly as they had been before the fire. Not only that, but they got the furniture as nearly as possible like what they had had. This all took a whole year, but when it was accomplished, and not till then, they felt at last that they were really at home, and could settle down into the old ways.

I can imagine their sighs of satisfaction when they did so. Cannot you?

Maud and Jack are going to a hotel on the shores of Lough Foyle, in Donegal. Here they intend to have a second honeymoon. They spent last Easter there, and fell in love with the beautiful country, the velvet air, the grounds sloping to the sea, with rocks and fine stretches of sand, the capital golf links, perfect cleanliness, and last, but not least, the excellent cooking. The terms, too, are very moderate. Would you like the address? I may mention that the proprietresses wear pale grey and white uniforms, like the seagulls.

I wished for you so much at the Sale and Exhibition of Irish Industries at the Ritz on Tuesday. Never have the lovely laces and embroideries looked better than they did in the beautiful ballroom and the adjoining rooms. An Irish harpist gave us wailing music, so characteristic of the distressful country, and a string band discoursed in the intervals. The Princess of Wales, very becomingly dressed in violet velvet, bought things at every stall. Her Royal Highness not only wore emeralds in her ears as a compliment to Ireland, but also had a lovely shamrock brooch as well. Half the peerage was represented by its ornamental sex. Lady Headfort was much observed. She was a purchaser. There were pretty faces and smart frocks. The Duchess of Montrose, the Marchioness of Downshire, Lady Helen Graham, the Marchioness of Londonderry, the Countess of Ilchester (in Parma violet velvet), Lady Castlereagh (in bright red velvet), and Lady Henry Bentinck (in pale grey), were among the notable beauties.

One of the Princess's purchases was a hatpin with a head of plaited leather. Her Royal Highness also bought knitted silk ties from Lady Arran, a lovely Limerick lace scarf from Lady Londonderry (who looked very handsome in black velvet, lace, pearls, and a large black hat), six knitted jerseys from Lady Waterford, a hand-painted white vellum covered box from Lady Mayo, tweeds from Lady Lucan and Lady Arthur Hill, a beautifully embroidered handkerchief sachet from the Duchess of Montrose, green enamel buttons from Lady Fingall, and a red frieze cloak from Princess Mary.

A bevy of pretty girls sold programmes. A very handsome, tall girl with a lovely complexion wore mauve silk, with an all-round cream lace yoke, the line of connection between it and the gown being hidden by raised velvet flowers, also mauve. Lady Dudley's dress was much admired. It was dark olive green, made Empire fashion, the yoke in olive chiffon over lace and the upper part of the gown embroidered upon this. The sleeves matched the yoke. The hat was made of marabout, with ostrich feathers, shaded from olive green to white.

Town was extremely full last week. We lunched one day at the Empress Club, and found the pretty dining-room full of well-groomed women in smart frocks. Quite a third of the gowns were tartan, made on the cross, and the skirts beautifully hung. The blouse worn with one of these was a shot blue and green taffetas, with a wide plastron in front embroidered with pastel blue and silver-grey in a design of forget-me-nots. The short, puffed sleeves ended in cuffs of écru lace matching that in the small, square yoke and collar. Folds of the silk began on the shoulders and ended under the plastron at the waist. Another gown that we admired was in fancy woollen, mole-colour, with a sun-ray pleated tablier, buttoned tabs holding the pleats in position, and made with a wide double pleat at the back. It had a pink and mole-coloured frou-frou round the inner side of the hem, and as the whole dress and its wearer suggested Paris, I suppose these frilly frou-frous are in again. And, remember, this particular one was on a tailor-made.

The nicest hat I have seen for a long time was a brown straw, rather a mushroom shape, raised from the hair by a brown velvet band, and with a cachepeigne of brown silk ribbon at the back. The only other trimming was a large bow of brown ribbon on one side and one similar but in green on the other. Simplicity, when cleverly carried out, is always successful. But in such a case it is a contradiction in terms, for it means the art that conceals art.

May 8 is the date fixed for the Loughborough Hospital Ball at the Hotel Great Central, and a quite unique feature will be the illumination of the whole of the courtyard on the same lines as the "Healtheries" of several years ago, with little lamps and coloured fountains. The work is to be done by Messrs. Pain and Sons for the good of the hospital, and, as they wrote Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen, who is getting it up, in consideration of the "great and uniform courtesy and kindness" they always received from the late Sir Philip Cunliffe-Owen. The hospital deserves a bumper ball, for it is one of the few that pay their way. This is due entirely to the good management. It has twenty-four beds, but the demands upon its accommodation are very great, and just now it is urgently in need of money to instal electric light, enlarge the operating theatre, and re-furnish the wards, nurses' and servants' bedrooms, and establish up-to-date sanitary appliances. The ball is certain to be a great success. The whole of the quadrangle is being arranged for sitting out. The Scots Guards band supplies the music, and the guinea tickets include the first-rate champagne supper, which so pleased the subscribers to the Windsor ball. There will be a rush for tickets, the number of which, of course, is limited.

One cannot have utilitarian advantages without paying for them, and modern progress, although it brings many conveniences in its train, is not without its drawbacks. Many of the most picturesque parts of London have vanished, and Paris is in the same case. The monochrome drawings of "Parts of Disappearing Paris," by C. Jonas, now at Graves' Gallery, reveal many quaint corners that will be sorely missed by lovers of the picturesque. The river-scenes are delightful, and the more minute M. Jonas becomes, the more charming his work is. The absence of over-emphasis in his drawing is particularly grateful.

We accepted an invitation to the showrooms just opened in Grape-street, Shaftesbury-avenue, by the well-known firm of E. and C. Braby, and found there some quaint and enchanting things. Fancy an ingle-nook after the early English style, with red bricks showing, and a big armchair, à la Darby and Joan, each side of the fire. A Dutch fireplace pleased us greatly, and our pleasure in these comfortable things was not diminished when we were told that they are inexpensive. Downstairs there were fine marble chimney pieces designed by eminent architects, high-class wooden chimney pieces, many of them beautifully carved, with steel hob and dog, grates representing Tudor, Jacobean, Renaissance, and Georgian periods, and among them a lovely blue-tiled fireplace with dull steel, a perfect dream of colour. One reason that this show is so fascinating is that it is combined with an exhibition of antique and modern furniture, mirrors, tapestries, and bric-à-brac, so arranged as to be in harmony with the mantelpieces and grates and hobs.

Dearest Madge,—Another great holiday time is already with us, although the last seems to have ended such a short while ago! And then, between times, there have been so many week-ends and various other interludes of the holiday kind. For us over here there has also been the "season," with its incessant rounds of amusement by night and by day. Our obvious way, under the circumstances, for getting a thorough change would be to stay at home. Not a fashionable, nor, in any sense, a progressive way, however, for society is very much of the opinion of Comus and his "smart set" that it is only "for homely features to keep home." Still, there might be points, besides the novelty of it, in trying the experiment of a real stay-at-home sit-by-the-fire holiday. For instance, it would throw each of us more or less into his or her own society, and give us the opportunity of renewing acquaintance with our own selves. We become such strangers to our own egos in the rush and crush of life, in the strenuous times of "seasons" and holidays. The unit gets lost, even by himself, amongst the flocks that fashion is herding. Of course, there might possibly be a chance that we would not find ourselves good company, but supposing the contrary happened, what an advantage it would be to know that we had an interesting companion closely associated with us and always at our beck and call throughout all the chances and changes of life. Fred is not in agreement with this view, and declares that for his part he wants no further acquaintance with himself. He had enough of it when he had the influenza at the beginning of the year, and he emphatically asserts that he did not find himself good company then.

Although last week saw the break-up of the Castle season, the dispersal of the Viceregal visitors, and of most of the officials from their Castle residences, Lord and Lady Aberdeen were unable to make their move to the Viceregal Lodge. Lady Aberdeen, though improving, was kept by her doctors on the safe side of remaining in her room. Rheumatism is a tedious ill to deal with, especially in a month of many weathers, and has a despotic way of asserting its power if any one tries to make a stand against it. There is nothing but a surrender at discretion to propitiate and disarm the enemy. And how hard that is for the energetic, whose aim in life is always to be lending a helping hand all round. Dublin Castle is not a popular Viceregal residence. It stands on an eminence, but is closely built up to all round by somewhat slummy regions. It lies far from the fashionable and residential part of the town, and has no open space on any side. If a Viceroy be included in the remaking of Ireland, now under consideration, a new residence will, it is to be hoped, be provided for him. It would be an undoubted advantage for him to get away from Dublin Castle, as well as from its traditions. Lord and Lady Aberdeen expect to spend Easter at the Viceregal Lodge. The Chief Secretary will possibly visit Ireland during the holidays, but will hardly establish his household gods at the official residence in the Phœnix Park until the long vacation time comes. The Under Secretary will return to his Lodge in Phœnix Park, where Lady MacDonnell is now staying, having left her residence in the Castle Yard last week.

Lord and Lady Londonderry are to be at Mount Stewart for the holiday time, and will do some entertaining there. Lord Londonderry will visit Belfast and take a leading part in rallying the North for the coming conflict over the new political amalgam—Devolution-Home Rule. The roll of the Orange drum is rather a muffled one now, since the days when Lord Londonderry's cousin, Lord Randolph Churchill, said, "Ulster will fight and Ulster will be right." How glad we shall be, we women, who have nothing to do with politics, when all the drums are laid aside, and we all together betake ourselves to the ways of pleasantness and the paths of peace.

Lady Plunket has come over here, having spent only a short time in England on her arrival from New Zealand. She is staying in Dublin for some little time, where Lady Dufferin, her mother, also was for some days. Lord Ashbourne and Lord Iveagh were here last week, coming over, as well as Sir Edward Carson, to attend a meeting in Trinity College, apropos of the Bryce scheme. Lord Iveagh is an "old Trinity" man, like Lord Ashbourne—the latter was also member for the University for many years. How much on the make we are just now! And if ours were a new country only just discovered. We must hope that it will be nice when we are finished, and that the reconstruction will not take too long. A new country and constitution ought to be nearly as exciting as a new frock. Newness in anything is, at all events,

THE SOUL OF TOBACCO.

Maeterlinck says of flowers that they yield up their soul in perfume.

What a noble thought!

But to the pipe-lover there is something infinitely sweeter than the perfume of flowers—the Soul of Craven Mixture.

The Soul of "Craven" is inimitable, unmatchable. You cannot find it in other Tobaccos any more than you can find the perfume of the natural rose in a soulless imitation.

And the appeal to the sense of taste! How bewitchingly and entrancingly Craven captivates the taste. How lovingly the smoker of Craven Mixture handles his pipe. To him the taste and perfume of Craven are indeed the very SOUL of Tobacco—something to dwell upon, to revel in; something, as J. M. Barrie says, "to live for."

interesting, in an age of incessant craving for excitement and sensation.

Next week we shall have the Ward Union Hunt Race Meeting at Fairy House to get us into training for the more important races of the following week. Wishing you a happy Easter holiday.
—Ever yours, CLARE.

Here are the recipes I promised you. Do you like eels? Try them broiled or baked:—

This fish, if taken alive, killed, skinned, and blanched, is quite digestible; blanching (that is, par-boiled), does away with the blue-looking skin, and the oil that remains after skinning, which makes the eel indigestible. Cut the eel into pieces about four inches long, take some good gravy, and stew the eel in it, after blanching. When nearly done, let them cool, then brush over with beaten egg, and dip them into fine spiced bread crumbs; place them on a plate; pour over each piece some clarified butter. Screen them with bread crumbs, place them in a tin, and bake or broil them over a clear fire. Serve them with this sauce. Put into a mortar a tablespoonful of chopped shallots, the yolks of two boiled eggs, a teaspoonful of mustard, salt, pepper, and a dust of cayenne. Now pound the whole together carefully. Stir in two tablespoonfuls of salad oil, a little malt vinegar, and the juice of a lemon. Rub all through a fine wire sieve, then stir into the whole one raw yolk of an egg. A little tarragon, or chervil vinegar, is an improvement.

This fowl à la Napolitaine is quite a new dish:—

Cut a fowl into neat members and fry them briskly in a stewpan with 2 oz. of butter, a minced onion, and 2 oz. of minced lean bacon. When they have taken a nice colour sprinkle them with a heaped tablespoonful of flour and mix in a pint and a half of stock, stir until boiling, then add a pound of tomato purée, season with salt and pepper, cover the stewpan, and place it in a moderate oven to simmer for nearly two hours, after which skim off the fat, dish the pieces of fowl en pyramide, pour the sauce over, and garnish with groups of cut, boiled macaroni.

Gâteau de Brie is a lovely lunch sweet:—

Beat the weight of 2 eggs in butter and sugar till they cream, beat in 3 yolks of eggs, mix them in 3 oz. of flour, 2 oz. of ground almonds, and a tablespoonful of brandy, mix in lightly the whipped whites of 3 eggs, and bake it in a buttered plain mould. When it is cold, cut it into slices, and take out the centre of 3 slices with a plain cutter. Beat 4 oz. of fresh butter with 6 oz. of sifted icing sugar, adding a few drops of vanilla, until it is quite white; spread the rounds of cake with the cream, replacing them one on the other; coat the outside with a layer of the butter, and decorate it with split, browned almonds and glacé cherries. Serve whipped cream in the centre, flavoured with vanilla and brandy.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

DR. BARNARDO'S HOMES.

62,312 Children Rescued from Misery, Trained, and Placed out in Life in 40 years.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Re Snowball Letter issued by Miss Robertson, of The Square, Kenilworth.

This letter was originally set going by a genuine friend of the Institutions, who, however, did not consult the Management prior to issuing her well-meant appeal. In its original form it was open to criticism; but since Dr. Barnardo's death in 1905 some one has altered very considerably the wording of the letter, and now in its present form it is highly misleading and actually doing harm to the Homes. It is absolutely untrue, for instance, to say that there is any thought of closing the doors. On the contrary, THE WORK IS BEING PROSECUTED WITH VIGOUR, AS HERETOFORE.

Every day 8 or 9 Destitute Boys or Girls are being admitted. About 8,000 Children are under the care of the Homes; and last year the fresh Admissions numbered 2,928.

The Council are very anxious to put this Chain-letter out of circulation altogether, and they will take it as a favour if all readers will aid them in their endeavour by giving publicity to this statement. At the same time they would urge the claims of the Homes upon the charitable public, for Support is urgently needed: THE DAILY FOOD BILL ALONE AMOUNTS TO £240. Even the Smallest Contributions will be gratefully received.

Remittances should be made payable to "Dr. Barnardo's Homes," crossed in the same way, and should be addressed to the Honorary Director, William Baker, Esq., M.A., LL.B.

THE NEW HUMORIST—READ HIM!

A LIGHT-HEARTED REBELLION

By JOHN LANGFIELD. 6s.

OUTLOOK: "A thoroughly agreeable story, and the author unfolds it with an evident relish, which is as infectious as it is exuberant. Altogether it is a book to dispel the megrims." PALL MALL GAZETTE: "Very agreeable and amusing reading." DUNDEE ADVERTISER: "Will be read with delight. Highly amusing." NEWCASTLE CHRONICLE: "That rare product of the pen—a tale which would prove equally interesting and entertaining to the boy or girl of 16 and the man or woman of 60." QUEEN: "Most amusing." ABERDEEN JOURNAL: "Wit sparkles throughout the story." NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN: "A rollicking bit of fun, well sustained." NEWCASTLE JOURNAL: "One of the brightest stories of the season." SCOTSMAN: "The characters, like the author, seem nearly all gifted with a quick sense of humour and lively powers of expression."

THE

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS,

Author of "Cardigan," "The Reckoning," &c.

Illustrations by FRED PEGRAM. [4th Edition.

THE WORLD says: "Distinctly a book to arrest attention. It is a powerful character study, so instinct with originality and force that it must stand out conspicuously."

THE DAILY MAIL says: "It is a pleasure in these days to take up a novel which cannot be read through at one sitting, and forgotten as soon as it is laid down."

THE STANDARD says:—"It is a tremendously absorbing kind of novel, painting the best type of New York people in clear, picturesque colours, and written in a style that is wonderfully forcible and attractive. Every page pulsates with the echo of the steps of people, with real thought, real life."

CONFLICT.

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY,

Author of "The Heart o' Gold," "An April Princess," &c.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "Will have a note of actuality for all who concern themselves with the newer development in women's life, and its fresh sincerity has a charm that is not to be undervalued."

THE DAILY MAIL says: "The love story is a strong and original one. . . . . Miss Smedley's writing is forceful, and she tells her story in a way to hold attention."

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER says: "It is a shrewd study, very boldly conceived and executed. . . . . All the characters in the book are portrayed with unusual vigour and spirit."

TAILORING IN ITS BEST SENSE

Tailoring in its best sense is not so much a matter of Rules as of Perception. It is matter of assisting a customer in the choice of Material which will suit both the wearer and the purpose, and of afterwards in no fixed way—fashioning that material into a garment which will fit perfectly, be properly comfortable, and have the full appearance of having been made for the wearer with all carefulness. It is a matter of successfully combining REASON with HANDICRAFT.

By following in his work the line of thought here indicated and charging Moderate Prices, Mr. Bult is able to satisfy the varied requirements of those who come to him for clothes.

"THE BYSTANDER" says: "There are few places where the man of average means can get the same quality, style, and fit in his clothes as at Mr. Bult's."

PRICE LIST (Illustrated with actual photographs) and Patterns will be sent Post Free on application. It should be stated for which garment the patterns are required.

The Baroness ORCZY

(Authoress of "The Scarlet Pimpernel")

writes:—"Your Featherweight Eye-glasses are charming—quite the lightest and neatest I have ever seen. No well dressed lady, who from necessity wears glasses, can afford to be without a pair."

Do you wear glasses? If so, Featherweight Eye-glasses will appeal to you. They are delightfully easy and firm on the nose and practically invisible. They are different to any other kind of eye-glasses, and quite unique in their daintiness. Shall we send you an illustrated and descriptive Booklet?

LETTERS FROM CELEBRITIES.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET ON NERVOUSNESS.

Industrial Farm Colony,
Duxhurst.

Dear Friend,—Your letter is one of many which I constantly receive begging me to tell of something which can help to restore tired nerves and over-worn strength, and you ask me to do so because I come in contact with so many who for these very reasons fail in the race of life, having sought the wrong remedy for such loss of nerve-power.

The description which you give me of your difficulty scarcely varies from that of which I am so often told. Work has become a drudgery, and life a heavy thing. You tell me that you go to bed feeling tired, and that you wake in the morning almost equally tired, that your food is distasteful to you, and that little things which used to sit lightly upon you have become heavy burdens; that even pleasure is toil. I know you have worked hard through many years, and have had much mental strain. This may in a measure account for your weakness, which is not brought about by any condition of actual disease, but which seems to arise from an even greater trouble—namely, that your nerve-force is seriously overspent.

It is important to understand that in these days of worry and over-excitement, the over-work (mental and physical) to which most of us are subject calls forth an undue expenditure of strength, and that to recuperate the vigour we have lost we must consider what sort of food or remedy we require.

Of course, the whole question of proper nourishment requires much thought and experience. Many forms of food and many restoratives are recommended, but having had to do with a great many people who have impaired their digestive organs and whose nerve-power has been seriously undermined, I do not think that I have come across anything which I believe a more suitable nutrient for all forms of weakness than Sanatogen. I do not know if you have tried it, but it seems to me, under the conditions such as you have described, an ideal preparation, because it provides a valuable tonic-food in the most suitable form. It consists, I believe, in the nourishing element of pure cows' milk, incorporated with which is a special nerve-tonic containing phosphorus. It has an invigorating power on worn-out nerves, and gives tone to exhausted tissues to a surprising extent. The feeblest system and the poorest digestive organs are able to assimilate it when they can really touch little else. I am strongly of opinion that you cannot do better than begin a course of Sanatogen if you wish to regain your strength.

Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep and invigorates the nerves, and it braces the patient to health, for I have noticed that with the restoration of the digestive organs the mind becomes more quickly active, and work, both mental and physical, becomes more easy, and the freshness and keenness which such people have lost (apparently altogether) return gradually, and bring with them an enjoyment of life and a feeling of hopefulness not hitherto experienced.

When the body is subjected to a course of Sanatogen the blood condition improves, the skin assumes a more healthy colour, the invigorated nerves are braced to a more healthy tone, and the whole human machinery is made fit for exercise and work and for fulfilling its functions in the most perfect manner.

The above is an abstract from a letter addressed by Lady Henry Somerset to an intimate friend. In view of the public interest associated with the subject of the letter, the recipient has obtained her Ladyship's gracious permission to make the contents more widely known. Additional information and interesting literature on the same subject may be obtained free of charge on application to the Sanatogen Company, 83, Upper Thames-street, London, E.C. Sanatogen is sold by all chemists, in packets, at 1s. 9d., 2s. 9d., 5s., and 9s. 6d.

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES NOS. 1,463 & 1,464.

The awards in above will be announced next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,470.

Father Vaughan, in the course of one of his slashing sermons, has recently run a tilt at the extravagant marks of affection lavished by so many Society women on their pet dogs, to which the good Father refers, in his trenchant way, as "little beasts."

Now, on the principle of audi alteram partem, I should like my competitors to put themselves in the position of one of these dumb "little beasts" and to indite the good Father a neat and effective rejoinder.

To that end I am this week offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

THE BEST HUMOROUS POEM, IN NOT MORE THAN EIGHT LINES OF RHYMED VERSE, SUPPOSED TO BE WRITTEN BY A "LITTLE BEAST" OF A PET DOG, IN ANSWER TO FATHER VAUGHAN'S DIATRIBES.

Any metre, in ordinary use, may be employed, subject to the condition that every line must rhyme with at least one other line in the poem; and the limit of eight lines must on no account be exceeded.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No competitor must send in more than one poem.

(ii) All poems must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, April 8, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of BEL DEMONIO, winner of 10s. 6d., in connection with TRUTH Puzzle No. 1,467, is Miss Isabel W. Ferguson, Edenballymore, Londonderry, Ireland.

MAKHILA.—Emendations are quite in order until the closing day of Competition; and I have duly substituted your revised version, in accordance with your request.

CLOTHES-HORSE.—Your explanation duly noted.

SIMPLEX.—I much regret that your solution for Boat Race Puzzle was received too late for inclusion.

NORTHLANDER.—Many thanks for your kind suggestions, which I will consider.

QUILL PEN.—I much regret that your solution of Puzzle No. 1,465 was received too late for inclusion.

J. MCGRIGOR ALLAN.—Your quotation from Virgil's Eclogues is decidedly apt. I am not printing it, however, for reasons already indicated, viz., that, owing to the large number of solutions received week by week, and the consequent demands on space, I am obliged rigorously to exclude all extraneous matter. You will, I am sure, understand this.

DERULA.—You will, doubtless, have seen my reply to you in last week's TRUTH.

JOHN O' GAUNT.—Very pleased to welcome, once again, an old competitor. Your change of address duly noted.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1579. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, April 3, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King was to have left Biarritz to-morrow night for Marseilles, but his Majesty's plans have been changed, and he will remain at Biarritz until Friday morning, as he has decided to travel by day, and will then proceed to Toulon, where he is to receive the Queen when she arrives from London on Saturday morning. The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert has arrived at Toulon from Portsmouth in company with the Admiralty yacht Enchantress. The King and Queen are to leave Toulon on Saturday afternoon for Cartagena, where they will be received by the King of Spain and the Queen Dowager. The Enchantress, with Lord Tweedmouth on board, is to accompany the Victoria and Albert to Cartagena. On leaving Cartagena the Royal yacht will proceed on a cruise in the Mediterranean until the 25th or 26th, when the King is to land at one of the Italian ports, and he will return direct to London overland. If the weather is fine the Queen and Princess Victoria will return to Portsmouth by sea, in which case they are to stop for a day at Cadiz in order to pay a visit to the Comtesse de Paris at the Château Villamanrique. The proposed route of the Royal yachts is being kept strictly secret in order to avoid the gêne of receptions and ceremonials, but it is settled that the King and Queen are to spend a few days at Naples.

It was stated in Truth a few weeks ago that there are to be no more State Concerts, these ceremonials having been permanently discontinued. One of the papers deplores the cessation of entertainments "which have been a feature of the Court season for many years." As a matter of fact, there has not been a single State Concert during the present reign. State concerts were established in the forties, at the suggestion of Prince Albert, as a Court entertainment suitable for such prim and serious personages of light and leading as could not be properly invited to a State Ball. Now, however, that Drawing-room Courts are held at night, with a supper to follow, they take the place of the concerts. State concerts were not entertainments for which invitations were coveted, as they were usually very tedious and uninteresting, while the ballroom was overpoweringly hot. The King's decision to discontinue these concerts is certainly not regretted at Court.

The Buckingham Palace invitation lists are being rigorously revised, and will probably be weeded somewhat extensively. There are two lists, the larger one for the Courts, and the smaller one for the State Balls. In future the number of guests invited by the Lord Chamberlain to a ball at the Palace will not exceed 2,000, and it is probable that the old custom of inviting certain personages to every such entertainment (such as ex-Ministers and ex-White Staves, and members of the class described by Lord Beaconsfield as "the high nobility") will be given up. This practice was commenced during the reign of William IV., and it has since been continued, but until within the last thirty years "society" was very much more restricted than it is now, while the candidates for Palace invitations have enormously increased in numbers.

Several papers printed a paragraph last week which announced that the Council which was held on Tuesday by the Prince of Wales for the King had been summoned to transact business connected with the adjournment of Parliament for the Easter recess. This is all nonsense. The Council was summoned for the transaction of certain routine business, which it was desired to complete at once, as it would have been inconvenient to wait for nearly five weeks until the King returns to London at the end of this month.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were to have spent Easter at Sandringham, but they changed their arrangements, and are staying for a fortnight at Frogmore Lodge. The Prince and Princess will not return to Sandringham before the middle of October, after their usual residence in Scotland. The Princess will go to Germany at the end of July, and is to remain abroad for about a month, the latter part of the time being spent in Switzerland. H.R.H. will pay visits to the Grand Duchess Augusta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz at her villa near Dresden, to the Grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at Schloss Rosenau, and to Princess Louis of Battenberg at the Château of Heiligenberg.

It is probable that the Emperor William will pay a visit to England next summer for the Cowes regatta week, in the Imperial yacht Hohenzollern. The R.Y.S. regatta begins on Tuesday, August 6. It is expected that the Emperor will arrange to arrive in the Solent on Wednesday, July 31, in which case his Majesty will probably go to Goodwood on the Cup day, while Friday, August 2, will be devoted to a long motor drive through the New Forest. During the Emperor's visit to Cowes he will live on board the Hohenzollern, and it is understood that he will stay until Saturday, August 10. The Emperor will not visit London, and he is to be entertained by the King and Queen on board the Victoria and Albert, which will be in Cowes Roads, with their Majesties on board, from Friday, August 2, until Monday, the 12th.

The Duchess of Albany will leave Claremont Park shortly on a visit to her sister, the Queen Dowager of the Netherlands, at The Hague. The Duchess is not going to Germany until the beginning of August. The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha have just left Coburg to spend a few weeks in Italy.

Princess Louis of Battenberg and her daughter, Princess Louise, have left London on a visit to Prince and Princess Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden at Stockholm, whence they will proceed to Russia, to visit the Tsar and Tsaritsa at Tsarskoe-Selo and the Grand Duchess Elisabeth at Ilinskoe, near Moscow. Princess Louis will spend the summer at Heiligenberg, and in October she is going to Malta for a stay of several months. During her visit to England the Princess was the guest of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House, of Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge, and of Princess Louise and the Duke of Argyll at Kent House.

The King and Queen of Norway will pay a private visit to England at the end of May or early in June, when they are to be the guests of their Majesties at Buckingham Palace and at Windsor Castle.

Lord Liverpool had been hopelessly ill for several months, and by permission of the King his duties had been undertaken by Lord Farquhar, the Master of the Household. His death is greatly regretted in Yorkshire and in Nottinghamshire, as he had been for many years a familiar and honoured figure in both counties. He was very genial in his manners, and a man of courtly air, as well as high culture and fine taste in art and literature. He was a most accomplished antiquary, and a great authority on all questions of archæology and family history. As a landlord he was generous and considerate, and he took a keen interest in the welfare of all residents on his estates, and generally in his neighbours of all classes. He was an enthusiastic Churchman, and not only presented valuable gifts to some of the churches with which he was connected, but served for many years as vicar's warden at Ollerton, and after his removal to Kirkham Abbey he usually read the lessons in the parish church.

In politics Lord Liverpool was a strong Liberal, and throughout his public life he staunchly supported Mr. Gladstone. He sat in the House of Commons as one of the Members for Notts from 1880 until 1892, when he retired, and a year later he was raised to the Peerage by Mr. Gladstone, and last year Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman advanced him to an earldom. He owned estates in Yorkshire, Notts, Leicestershire, and Northamptonshire. He was twice married. His first wife was a daughter of Mr. and Lady Fanny Howard, granddaughter of the sixth Earl of Carlisle, and his second (who survives him) is a daughter of Colonel and Lady Emily Cavendish.

Lord Liverpool came of an ancient, wealthy, and influential Whig family. He was the younger son of the late Mr. George Savile Foljambe, of Osberton Hall, Notts, a domain now owned by his elder brother, who himself sat in the House of Commons for twenty-eight years, and he was made a Privy Councillor in 1895. Lord Liverpool's mother was the daughter and co-heiress of the third Earl of Liverpool, and niece of the Minister who was described by Lord Beaconsfield as "the Arch-Mediocrity." Lady Selina Jenkinson was first married to Viscount Milton, eldest son of the fifth Earl Fitzwilliam. He died in 1835, and ten years later his widow married Mr. Savile Foljambe, the late Lord Liverpool being their eldest son. He would have taken the title of Liverpool in 1893, but objections were raised at the College of Arms that this title belonged to an earldom, and ought not, therefore, to be taken for a barony. It has always been understood that when Mr. Gladstone retired from office in 1894, Queen Victoria offered him an earldom, and suggested that he should take the Liverpool title, as being appropriate from his family connection with that city.

Mrs. Selwyn, who died at Lichfield last week at the age of ninety-eight, was the only daughter of Sir John Richardson, one of the puisne judges of the Court of Common Pleas, who was raised to the Bench by Lord Eldon in 1818. She married George Augustus Selwyn in 1839. He was then Curate of Windsor, but two years later he was induced by Archbishop Howley and Bishop Blomfield to accept the newly founded See of New Zealand. Mrs. Selwyn, who was a clever, energetic woman, zealously assisted her husband in his work, and she shared his hardships and worries. They returned to England in 1867 for the Pan-Anglican Synod, and, on the death of Bishop Lonsdale, Lord Derby offered Selwyn the See of Lichfield, which he twice refused before he was finally induced to accept it. The new Bishop and Mrs. Selwyn abandoned Eccleshall Castle, the former episcopal residence, and established themselves at Lichfield. Bishop Selwyn died in 1878, and his wife continued to reside at Lichfield, where she was actively interested in many good works. She retained her faculties to the last. Mrs. Selwyn suffered a great grief in 1898, when she lost her younger son, who had for some years held the See of Melanesia, and was at the time of his much-lamented death Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge.

SPRING—IN THE PRESS.

The hedges shoot, the linnets sing,
The lambkin cuts his capers;
And—yet a surer sign of spring—
They're writing to the papers:

"I heard the cuckoo yesterday,"
"I saw a Painted Lady,"
"I found an orchis blooming gay
Within a coppice shady."

"The lilac trees are all in bud Down here in Sleepy Hollow,"
"I've roused a tadpole from the mud,"
"I've seen the primal swallow;"

And so on. But the while I doubt
If such they've really seen, Sir,
And read the reams they ladle out
With rather sceptic mien, Sir,

I'm glad to meet them, I confess,
And always feel elated
When cuckoos cuckoo—in the press,
A fortnight antedated,

And swallows are—on paper—seen
Some weeks before they're due, Sir,
Because spring's journalistic "green"
Forecasts spring's verdure true, Sir.

A rare opportunity is offered to any enterprising capitalist who would like to become practically the proprietor of a fashionable and flourishing health resort. Messrs. Knight, Frank, and Rutley announce the sale by auction of the Middleton Evans Estates, which comprise the greater part of Llandrindod Wells, including the Pump House Hotel, with its pump room and the well-known mineral springs.

This year's show of the Royal Agricultural Society is to be held at Lincoln, which place was selected in preference to Ipswich. The show of 1908 will be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Lincoln show is to take place during the last week of June, under the presidency of Lord Yarborough. It is expected that the King will be the guest of Lord Brownlow, Lord-Lieutenant of Lincolnshire, at Belton Hall, near Grantham, and that the Prince of Wales will stay with Lord Yarborough at Brocklesby Park. The Duke of Connaught and Prince Christian will also visit Lincoln during the show week.

Belton, the old seat of the Custs, is a very handsome and remarkably well-planned house, which was designed by Sir Christopher Wren, and "improved" by Wyatt. It is in the form of the letter H. The house contains some good portraits by Lely, Romney, Gainsborough, and Reynolds, but the best pictures were removed many years ago to Ashridge, Lord Brownlow's place in Hertfordshire. There are some superb carvings by Grinling Gibbons at Belton, and the house contains a great deal of splendid old furniture. The park of seven hundred acres is well-wooded and much varied, and is ornamented by three lakes formed by the river Witham. There are pleasant gardens, which are well laid out. The view from the Belmont Tower, near the eastern lodge, is one of the most extensive in the district. Belton is altogether the most attractive country seat in Lincolnshire.

Lord Durham has presented his grandfather's collection of private papers, relating to the affairs of Canada, to the Government of that Dominion. There are about 4,000 papers altogether, and they give the whole secret history of a most important and exciting epoch in Canadian affairs. The first Earl of Durham, whose biography has been recently published, was practically Dictator of Canada for more than a year after the rebellion of 1837, and he was very badly treated by the Whig Ministry. His papers have been carefully preserved at Lambton Castle since his death in 1840.

The sale of the Rowfant copy of the First Folio Shakespeare for the record price of £3,600 (purchaser Mr. Quaritch, on behalf of a well-known American collector) is exceptionally interesting, because the book has a curious history. It was purchased for a comparatively small sum about 1870 by the late Mr. Locker Lampson, but it then lacked the leaf with Ben Jonson's verses. In "My Confidences" there is an entertaining account of a visit paid by Mr. Locker Lampson to the late Sir Henry Dryden (who is described as "Mr. Zachary Dene"), with the object of inducing him to part with the missing leaf, which was contained in the Canons Ashby copy of the First Folio. The mission failed, as he would not accept an offer of £80; and some years elapsed before Mr. Locker Lampson was able to complete his copy by paying £100 for the missing leaf, which was found pasted in an old scrap book.

The highest price previously paid for a First Folio was £1,720, in July, 1901. In 1864, Baroness Burdett-Coutts paid £720 for the Daniels copy, which was by no means a fine one. The Rowfant library was sold some years ago en bloc to an American dealer, who disposed of the Locker Lampson First Folio to a New York collector for £2,000. This book was originally published at twenty shillings per copy. The Rowfant copy of the first edition of Izaak Walton's "Compleat Angler," which Mr. Locker Lampson purchased for £105, now realised £1,290. The highest price previously paid was £415, in December, 1896.

People would save themselves trouble as well as me if they would refrain from writing me anonymous letters in praise of quack remedies which they see unfavourably noticed in these columns. This remark applies specially to the ladies who expect to convince me (or my readers) in this way of the virtues of the Viavi humbug. I had quite a long letter of this kind last week from an unknown lady, apparently at Edgbaston. If this lady will forward her name and full address, and those of the medical gentlemen who attended her before she put herself in the hands of the Viavi people, I shall be pleased to ascertain exactly what her statements are worth. At present they are worth nothing, and having been rendered suspicious of my fellow-creatures by many years' experience of their little ways, I am sorry to say that I take the letter and all others of its class to emanate from somebody interested in the sale of the stuff.

Since I reluctantly decided a little time ago that people who want advice or assistance from me in any shape must forward a coupon from the cover of Truth, by way of establishing that they are, so to speak, bonâ-fide holders for value of my paper, I have had any number of complaints from libraries, clubs, regimental messes, and other places where Truth is taken for general consumption, that the restriction leads to the mutilation of the paper as soon as it appears by unscrupulous persons who cut out the coupon for their own use. Apparently I am not the only sufferer in the same way. The managers of the Boston Free Library, who have written to me on the subject, state that they have long been troubled by the mutilation of newspapers and magazines in this way. They kindly warn me that if anybody has been applying to me for advice from Boston he has probably not paid for it; but unfortunately this does not help me much, as I have a good many more than one appreciative reader in Boston, and in most other towns. The only suggestion I can offer is that the managers of all libraries should obliterate the coupon before placing the paper in their rooms. This would be a kindness which I should appreciate.

It is certainly a remarkable proof of the baseness of human nature that people who want an editor to do something for them should not only shirk the expenditure of a few coppers on a copy of the paper by way of remunerating him for his trouble, but try to humbug him by sending a coupon to prove that they buy the paper, when they have really stolen it. Attempts have been made before now at defining "the height of meanness." I suggest as a new one the case of the individual who desires to know how he can invest £1,000 to the best advantage, and in order to obtain the best advice goes to the nearest free library and cuts out the coupon from the cover of Truth in order to palm himself off on the City Editor as a purchaser of the paper.

In the case of regimental messes and libraries, this question has a somewhat different aspect. An indignant "Tommy" who wrote to me the other day was of opinion that the coupon was always cut out of Truth before it was placed in the reading-room by the sergeant-major with a view of discouraging the rank and file from consulting the Editor on little points of military practice, or army reform, or whatever it might be. If any sergeant-major is capable of such an action, which I hardly believe, it can only be because he does not read his Truth attentively himself. Coupons are only required from correspondents who want an answer by post or advice from my City Editor. I should imagine, therefore, that if any sergeant-major takes the course above mentioned, it is because he requires advice about his investments or something of that kind. This, however, does not make his conduct the less reprehensible.

So steps are being taken to start a publishing business in connection with the Times Book Club. This is what many people expected when the Book Club first came into collision with the bookselling trade and the publishers. The fear of it probably did as much as anything else to unite all interested in the book trade against the Book Club, for if that concern ran the booksellers off their legs, as it threatened to do, it would be in a fair way to obtain command of the publishing as well as the distributing branch of the business. The prospect of a powerful monopoly of this kind, run on smart American principles, alarmed booksellers, publishers, and authors in about equal degrees, and I should say justly. It would be one of those commercial undertakings which promise little benefit to anybody in the long run except the promoters and shareholders.

In the move that they are now taking, the Book Club strategists evidently propose to carry the war into the enemy's country. How this may affect the result of the "sort of war" in which the Times is engaged it is impossible to predict; but a publishing house can hardly exist in a state of internecine conflict with the bookselling trade. It looks, however, as if there might be a chance at last of the poor author getting something out of the battle. The Times has striven vigorously, with the help of Mr. G. B. Shaw and other free lances, to persuade the authors that Codlin is the friend, not Short, and during the last few weeks it has been devoting an article a day to demonstrating the accuracy of the theory that Barabbas was a publisher. Should it start in the publishing line itself, therefore, it will be bound to treat its authors with a munificence to which they have hitherto been strangers—bound not only in common decency, but also because (as we know already) the Book Club must be stocked at any cost. It will be interesting, therefore, to see the new publishing business at work. I would recommend authors to carefully preserve the Times articles on the Barabbas question for reference in their negotiations with the new firm.

The mere journalist is no partaker of what Mr. Zangwill has beautifully spoken of as "The Priesthood of Letters." Though he may get his livelihood by means of pen, ink, and paper, or may even run to a typewriter, he belongs only to the outer court of the temple. His calling brings him no nearer to the sacrosanct office of a priest than the verger who has charge of the hymn-books, or the washerwoman who gets up the surplices. At the best, all he can aspire to do is to burn a little incense when Meredith, the High Priest, enters the Holy of Holies, or when Father Shaw delivers the Gospel or ascends to the pulpit. From my humble station I would not presume to express an opinion on the relations of the Priesthood as incorporated in the Society of Authors, with Barabbas on the one hand or a Book Club on the other. The T.B.C. merely interests me in its relation to the humbler vocation of journalism.

From this point of view, the news that the Times is going into the book-publishing business affects me as it would to learn that the Spectator had decided to supply its readers with its own brand of cigars and tobacco, or that our dear old friend, Mr. Punch, was wheeling a fruiterer's barrow in Fleet-street. It is not any old-fashioned notions about dignity that trouble me, but simply that I should be sorry to see a once prosperous neighbour in business reduced to these shifts, and I should doubt their good effect upon his journalistic activities. I do not question that Mr. Punch might blossom out into a prosperous greengrocer if he gave his mind to the business; or that the Spectator Colorado Claros would prove indispensable to every connoisseur; but I should fear a suggestion of onions in my Punch, and a whiff of the other fragrant vegetable—not cabbage, of course—with my Spectator, just as I find my Times every day positively reeking of Book Club. Neither the intrinsic merits nor the commercial value of a newspaper can possibly be improved by such associations. It is pretty certain to be the reverse.

That is why I have always regarded the Times Book Club as a deplorable experiment from the newspaper point of view. As a matter of business, it is the same thing as distributing the Times as wrappers for parcels of tea. The better the tea and the greater its commercial success the greater the certainty that the wrapper will be found merely an expensive superfluity, and will presently be discarded in favour of something cheaper. It must already be felt, I should think, that the Book Club could get on much better without the Times than with it, and if a successful publishing business is tacked on to the Book Club, that view of the situation is likely to be strengthened. I can quite understand that it might pay to run a general business like Harrod's Stores or John Barker's in conjunction with a daily paper as an advertising medium, but a halfpenny paper would be better for this purpose than a penny one, while a threepenny paper is comparatively useless.

A lady in the musical profession gives an interesting account of her experiences with Mr. G. R. Hatton, alias "Guy Roslyn." In the autumn of 1905 she received the usual application from Hatton for particulars of her life for Men and Women, and, thinking that it might be of use as a professional advertisement, she sent the desired particulars, together with a photo block, and paid 10s. 6d. Several months elapsed, during which all she could extract from Hatton was that there had been some hitch in the issue of the next number of his publication; and then, in March, 1906, she was told by him that Men and Women had come to grief, and that he was starting a new publication called The Biograph, and invited payment of any sum of money up to £5 in order to help him make a start. Again the lady sent 10s. 6d., nominally for twelve copies of the paper. Needless to say, she never received them, and after many months of waiting and writing, all she could obtain was the return of her photo block. When she threatened to take proceedings for the return of her money, Hatton calmly informed her that it would be quite useless as he had lost everything. Nevertheless, in March, 1907, the man writes again from his safe retreat in Canvey Island, Essex, requesting "particulars of your life for The Biograph," evidently forgetting all that had previously passed between him and the lady. Hatton has been swindling people right and left by this game for several years past, and anyone who would hand him over to the police would be doing a public service.

NO PARSON NEED APPLY.

A Parson's Protest.

An ex-M.P., not well advised,
Whose curious will I've lately read,
His daughters all hath penalised
If they, perchance, should parsons wed;

Because a parson don't (says he)
Believe his Ordination vows,
And, thus dishonest, cannot be
To any girl an honest spouse.

If that is the testator's line,
Why did he only parsons ban,
When the same vice he might assign
To nearly every mortal man?

Do M.P.s never disbelieve
The stuff they on the hustings spout?
Or promise what they can't achieve—
When bye-elections are about?

Do barristers ne'er raise in court
False pleas, defending some bad egg?
Are journalists too straight a sort
To pull at times the public's leg?

Don't great physicians e'er pretend
To knowledge that they haven't got?
Do auctioneers, with goods to vend,
Believe their own high-coloured rot?

No; every man, of every grade,
At whiles must prudent falsehoods weave,
And, in the interests of his trade,
Make statements that he can't believe.

So if strict truthfulness the key
To wedlock is, it follows, then,
Our daughters all must spinsters be
And all our sons unmarried men.

The Lords of the Manor of Knutsford, Cheshire, who are the patrons of the vicarage of Knutsford, have presented the Rev. G. L. A gallant officer, who says that he has written to several editors in the same strain, but without gaining a hearing, sends me a long letter, of which I subjoin samples just to show that I am more intelligent, or more indulgent, than my contemporaries. The opening passage, which I am constrained to omit, is a somewhat fierce indictment of our national lack of patriotism and our shop-keeping proclivities:—

> Mr. Haldane proposes to obtain officers to replace the Militia officers, who most assuredly will resign en masse, by recruiting from the University. Just when young men should be doing their utmost to work to pass examinations to set them up in life he mildly suggests that they should be attached to a regiment for a year to learn a smattering of soldiering.
> As regards the rank and file, who on earth can expect a man who is in lucrative employment to join the Home Defence Force, thereby putting a noose round his neck in the shape of at any time being called out for six months' embodiment at 1s. a day? Can the man expect his employer to keep his place open for him when his generous Government sees fit to let him go. . . . Mr. Haldane says he has had most satisfactory letters from employers of labour. I am very glad to hear it, but he does not say he has asked the unemployed. Ask your friends whether they are prepared to let their butlers, valets, grooms, gardeners, etc., go for a fortnight annually, so that they can join the Defence Force. They will surely say Yes, and explode with wrath at the idea of not being called a patriot. But will they do it? I say No. . . .
> Let us stop being hypocrites. We all know there are only two ways to have a good second line, and these are by conscription and by paying for it. Let us make up our minds which we will have, and stop trying to bring in a scheme that ninety-nine people out of a hundred know is doomed to failure.

I suppose that there are a good many people talking, if not writing, more or less in this strain, but I am not at all surprised that they should find a difficulty in persuading editors to publish their letters. No one can say with any certainty that 300,000 men will voluntarily accept the terms of service Mr. Haldane proposes, but it is extravagant nonsense to say that ninety-nine people out of a hundred "know" that it will not be done. There are about 270,000 Volunteers and Yeomanry serving at present—to say nothing of some 90,000 Militiamen. It is possible that some of them may not be able to accept the new conditions; it is equally possible that the new system may please many men who have been dissatisfied with the official treatment of the Volunteers in the past. The county associations, largely composed of employers of labour, which are to be responsible for the raising of the territorial units, will bring entirely new influences to bear on recruiting, as well as in counteracting all such difficulties in the way of service and training as the above letter alludes to, and a man must be of a very cocksure habit of mind who predicts that all that these associations can do is "foredoomed to failure."

Again, it is absurd to picture 300,000 youths of all classes joining for four years' service at about eighteen years of age as being all "in lucrative employment;" still more to try and frighten them with the prospective loss of their situations when they are "called out for six months' embodiment at 1s. a day." The embodiment of the Territorial Army is only contemplated in the case of a very serious war which has taken the whole of the Regular Army on foreign service; and every man mustered for the defence of the country under such conditions will be a hero. Remembering how much was done for men under the very different conditions of the South African War, to suppose that the county associations will not be able to save the men of their own units from suffering by embodiment during a grave national crisis is simply foolish.

I do not understand Mr. Haldane's scheme for obtaining officers "to replace the Militiā officers" who are going to resign en masse, precisely as my correspondent does, but I may point out to him that there is a goodly proportion of youths at the Universities who are by no means bound to pass examinations "to set them up in life," and who would be all the better for having a little useful occupation found for them. In saying so much, I by no means imply the opinion that the problem of officering—and non-commissioned officering—the Territorial Army efficiently is likely to be settled in a minute. But I would strongly recommend the writer of the above letter, and all who talk in the same sort of strain, to indulge in a little clear thinking before they resort to strong language, and to show their patriotism by refraining from "crabbing," even before they understand it, the first business-like attempt that has been made to convert the auxiliary forces into an organised army.

Not very long ago some men on the night staff at Connaught Hospital, Aldershot, were discovered refreshing themselves at their early morning meal with eggs and bacon—provided, of course, at their own expense. The medical officer who made this alarming discovery pointed out to the men that they were only allowed biscuit, cheese, and coffee at this hour. The men themselves do not seem to have been punished for the outrage, but subsequently the two cooks who had served up the eggs and bacon were returned to duty—though it might have been thought that the offence of buying the unlawful food and eating it was more heinous than that of merely cooking it. The incident helps to show what a zeal for discipline the Army medico acquires with his military rank—and what a plentiful lack of discretion occasionally accompanies it.

A correspondent forwards a delectable specimen of "Protestant" literature handed to a soldier at Gibraltar with an invitation to attend a meeting at the Soldiers' Home, Europa. The pamphlet purports to record the ravings of an hysterical female of the "escaped nun" class, and a person must be a crazy fanatic who could expect to effect any good result by distributing such garbage among soldiers. The Soldiers' Home in question has presumably some official connection with the Army, if not with the Church of England, and it ought not to be mixed up with such mockery of religion.

The naval correspondent of the Daily Chronicle contributes an interesting item to our knowledge of the idiosyncrasies of the Japanese:—

> Japanese naval discipline is a marvellous thing in British eyes. There are no ship police, and there is practically no code of punishment. An officer remonstrates with a faulty man, reminds him of his ancestors, and appeals to his love of country. If the man is recalcitrant the officer slaps his face once or twice, and that brings him to his senses.

The Japanese are always being held up to us for imitation, but little facts like these show the difficulty of copying them. Obviously, a man must have had ancestors before he can be reminded of them. In this country ancestors are the possession of an insignificant minority, and they are probably very rare on the lower deck. With the progress of democracy the enjoyment of such luxuries may be extended, but, judging by some examples that we see, it is by no means certain that to remind an Englishman of his ancestors will always keep him straight. Besides, so much must always depend upon the ancestors. Slapping the face as a disciplinary measure comes nearer the British code. It is not much worse than 10A. It might be worth thinking about the next time the stokers are troublesome.

A memorial signed by 376 M.P.s, including many well-known members of the Liberal, Labour, Conservative, and Irish parties, has been presented to the Prime Minister asking for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the grievances of the assistant clerks (new class) in the Civil Service. This class was instituted in 1896, boy clerks on reaching the age of nineteen being eligible for admission to it by open competitive examination. The initial salary is £55 per annum, which formerly advanced by annual increments of £2 10s. to £70, thence by £5 to £100 (when an "efficiency barrier" has to be passed), and afterwards by the same increment to a maximum of £150. This is, indeed, still the arrangement in the case of all who entered the service prior to April, 1905, but for those who have been appointed since that date the initial increment has been increased to £5. The average age of admission to this class is twenty years, so that even under the present rule an assistant clerk is twenty-nine before he receives £100 a year.

On the recommendation of the Bradford Committee, the salaries of postal servants residing in large cities were increased to give them between £90 and £100 a year at the age of twenty-five (which was regarded as a proper and desirable age for marrying), and the class of assistant clerks certainly seems to have an equally strong claim to similar consideration. There are about 1,300 of them, and with the exception of 200 in Dublin, practically the whole number are employed in the Government offices in London, where the cost of living clearly makes their salaries inadequate, at any rate during the first ten years or so of their service. The maximum of £150 is, too, decidedly small for the "model employer" to pay, considering that many of these assistant clerks perform the same duties as those in the second division, and the fact, moreover, that a man in this class receives no increase at all during the last twenty years of his service can hardly be conducive to efficiency. It is to be hoped that the Prime Minister will see his way to comply with the request for an inquiry.

A recent appointment to the secretaryship of the Calcutta Corporation has provoked a good deal of adverse criticism in that city. When the post became vacant last year Mr. N. P. Mookerjee, the municipal magistrate, was appointed acting secretary. To this arrangement exception was taken on the ground that it would be calculated to destroy the feeling of independence which a stipendiary magistrate should possess if he were to be eligible for preferment in the municipal service. The force of this argument was admitted, but the official answer was that the employment of Mr. Mookerjee as secretary was only a temporary measure. Now, however, he has been given the permanent appointment, and this proceeding is defended on the ground that as six months have elapsed, and as he has shown himself to be an admirable secretary, the position is changed. Nobody questions Mr. Mookerjee's qualifications for the office, but the objection to his selection—an objection endorsed by a judge of the Calcutta High Court—was made as a matter of principle, and the idea that it has been removed by delaying the permanent appointment for a few months is transparently absurd.

The case of Mr. A. C. Rolt, to which I devoted a good deal of attention a couple of years ago, has been reopened in the Indian press owing to the treatment which that gentleman has since received at the hands of the Government of Bengal. The facts of the case were briefly as follows:—Mr. Rolt had been for ten years employed by the Court of Wards as manager of the Khagra estate, when a criminal charge of taking a bribe was preferred against him. At the trial in the Calcutta High Court it was shown that this charge was based on false evidence and forged documents, the outcome of a conspiracy among parties connected with the estate. The jury not only acquitted Mr. Rolt without waiting to hear the defence, but expressed the opinion that the conspirators had been assisted by the "culpable carelessness" of Mr. Lea, the Collector of Purneah, who conducted the prosecution. Mr. Justice Henderson endorsed and emphasised this opinion in a minute which he submitted to the Government of Bengal, severely condemning the conduct of Mr. Lea and other officers concerned in the getting up of the prosecution.

The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir Andrew Fraser, subsequently attempted to whitewash the censured officials by publishing an ex parte resolution in reply to the judge's minute. While seeking to exonerate Mr. Lea, however, the Bengal Government acknowledged—as it was absolutely bound to do—that Mr. Rolt had been grossly wronged, and assurances—written and oral—were given him that he should be eligible for further service, and that his claims would be fully considered in connection with any suitable vacancy. Against the advice of his friends, Mr. Rolt relied on these assurances, instead of instituting a civil suit for damages. He has now made known the result in the Calcutta Englishman. As manager of the Khagra estate he received Rs.600 a month, with a free house and various allowances, equal to at least Rs. 1,000 a month. For over a year the Government, though profuse in promises, made him no actual offer of a new berth. He was then offered an appointment in Calcutta at Rs.300 a month, with no quarters or allowances. He took this, believing that in due course something better would be found for him; but seeing that his claims were being systematically passed over when vacancies occurred, he has now resigned, and made public his reasons for doing so.

Two years ago a leading Anglo-Indian journal described the Rolt case as the heaviest blow to the prestige of British justice in India during recent memory. This was written in reference to the attempt of the Government to brush aside the judicial censure of its officers, and what has since happened is an aggravation of the scandal. The promise of further employment which was given to Mr. Rolt has been kept to the ear but broken to the hope. He was clearly entitled to expect as good an appointment as that which he lost through the conspiracy of which he was the victim, and the treatment he has experienced is disgraceful in the extreme to the Government of Bengal. I hope that Mr. John Morley will take this view of the matter and see that justice is yet done to Mr. Rolt.

The appointment of Mr. Shee, K.C., to the Recordership of Liverpool will be very popular in Lancashire, where Mr. Shee first made his reputation, and where he has always had a large practice. Mr. Shee is a son of the late Mr. Justice Shee, and not only a thorough lawyer, but a man of sound judgment and never-failing common sense, and if I ever had to be tried by a Recorder I should regard it as a mitigation of my misfortune to be brought before him. Let us hope that all prisoners will feel the same. Mr. Shee has never obtained a seat in Parliament, but he has fought two elections on the Liberal side, so that he has earned his promotion politically as well as professionally, as a Recorder is expected to do.

The opinions of civilised people in regard to the proper punishment of murder vary strangely. A young Russian lady, desirous of assassinating a political enemy in a Swiss restaurant, shoots an innocent Frenchman by mistake, and get four years' imprisonment. A good-for-nothing scamp, in a fit of excitement, kills poor old Mr. Whiteley, and is sentenced to death. He is reprieved, apparently out of consideration for his wife and an unborn babe, but he is still condemned to a convict's fate for the rest of his life. I cannot see many "extenuating circumstances" about either crime, but even less in the Swiss case than the other. "Que messieurs les assassins commencent" may or may not be a good argument for capital punishment; but at least the would-be assassin should make sure that he has got the right man before he goes to work, and should take the consequences if he kills the wrong one. Nor can I see any reason for departing from the rule if "monsieur l'assassin" happens to be an interesting and good-looking damsel. At any rate, it makes no difference to the victim of the mistake.

The strongest argument I can see against capital punishment is that it constantly exposes the course of justice to be interfered with by maudlin outbursts of sentiment. The outcry on behalf of the wretched creature, Rayner, was purely sentimental, and quite irrational. The man did his best to kill himself, and is said to have expressed regret at his reprieve. He seems to have formed a fairly accurate judgment of the value of his own existence. If such a man prefers to be hanged, and the law decrees that he shall be hanged, what intelligible reason is there for keeping him in prison instead, to spend the rest of his days miserably at the public expense? There is no mercy about it. No man of sound judgment, viewing the matter dispassionately, would hold that penal servitude for life is preferable to immediate death. No reason, so far as the merits of the case are concerned, can be advanced against the death penalty which does not tell equally against the other. The sentence is commuted—in this case contrary to the wishes of the only person directly concerned—simply because the sentiments provoked by the idea of killing a man in cold blood cause a certain number of fussy people to lose their heads and get up a noisy agitation against the sentence.

This is grossly unfair to the general body of murderers. If their cases were examined in the right spirit, it would doubtless be found that nearly all of them are entitled to sympathy. Either there was a good reason for the murder or there was not. If there was such a reason, it is an equally good reason for not hanging the murderer. If there was not, the murderer is an unreasonable person and must not be held responsible for all he does. Probably his aunt was in a lunatic asylum, or his grandfather had fits, or he married the wrong woman, or his moral sense was impaired by gin. But not one murderer in a dozen gets a chance of a public agitation in his favour on such grounds as these. On almost every Judge's circuit, at almost every session of the Central Criminal Court, some poor fellow is sentenced to death and goes to the scaffold without a protest from the public. It is only when some accidental circumstance gives a sensational character to the crime that the case gets taken up in the papers and the murderer receives the sympathy and consideration due to him. This is not justice, and it is obviously due solely to the death penalty. Did you ever see an agitation for the release of a burglar on the ground that his uncle had fits, or his mother drank, or that he was in doubt about his parentage?

I was glad to see that the bankrupt alien whose performances have lately been described at some length in these columns was formally brought under the notice of Mr. Lloyd-George last week by questions in Parliament. Sir William Evans Gordon was the questioner. He failed to obtain the information he sought as to the number, liabilities, assets, etc., of alien bankrupts, for the simple reason that when a man "goes through the Court" the Court takes no cognisance of his nationality. But Mr. Lloyd-George recognised the seriousness of the evil, and practically promised that a departmental committee would look into the question. The committee may be expected to make some very edifying discoveries.

I do not look, however, upon the stranger within our gates with the same eye as Sir William Evans Gordon, and it must not be supposed that this is a branch of the alien question. The East-End alien has come to the front as a successful practitioner in bankruptcy—I suppose partly because he is an adept in the shadier tricks of commercial life, and partly because his foreign connections give him special facilities for "stowing the swag" which he is able to accumulate under the protection of the Bankruptcy Acts. He has served a certain purpose in advertising the defects of the law, but those defects exist equally for the benefit of natives and aliens, and plenty of British-born subjects of his Majesty take full advantage of them every year. There is not the slightest occasion, therefore, for any special information on the subject of alien bankrupts, or any legal discrimination between natives and foreigners. What is wanted is such amendment of the law as will protect honest tradesmen against insolvent banditti whatever their nationality.

A striking illustration of the rapacity of the usurer Pockett was given in a case in the Brighton County Court last week. The borrower was a local auctioneer and estate agent named G. F. Attree, now a bankrupt, and at the time of the transactions Pockett was trading as "Gerald Chesney," 25, Regent-street, London. Like many members of the bloodsucking tribe, Pockett changes his alias as it suits his convenience, and a short time ago, finding that "Gerald Chesney" had become rather too notorious, he transformed himself into "John Weston and Co.," of 30, Duke-street, S.W. In a series of transactions extending over a couple of years or so, Mr. Attree received from Pockett a total amount of £1,400, and paid back a total amount of £2,750. Pockett, however, claimed that he was entitled to a further £1,250. The interest on the loans varied, but in several instances it was at the rate of 233 per cent. per annum, and the promissory notes contained the customary default clause making the whole amount of principal and interest become due upon default in payment of any single instalment. As security for one loan of £300, repayable with £100 for interest in four months, Mr. Attree handed over to Pockett shares in a company of the value of from £750 to £1,000. Pockett, nevertheless, compelled him to make the following acknowledgment:—

> I quite understand that the reason you charge the £100 is because of the risk you run in lending without security, but it suits my purpose not to be under any obligation to friends.

In the County Court last week Mr. Attree explained that this mendacious document was "one of the moneylender's forms, and he had either to sign it or get nothing at all." Pockett's object was, of course, to have this acknowledgment ready for production in the event of any attempt being made to get the transaction set aside.

The matter came before the County Court Judge on an application by the trustee in the bankruptcy under Section 1 (Sub-section 3) of the Moneylenders Act. The trustee asked that the whole of the transactions between Pockett and Attree should be reopened on the ground that the moneylender's charges and conditions were harsh and unconscionable, and that an account should be taken of the sums actually advanced, and interest allowed at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. On this basis Pockett, instead of receiving more money, would have had to disgorge about £1,200 for the benefit of the estate. While this application was pending, however, Pockett gave notice of the withdrawal of the proof for £1,250, which he had put in against the estate, and the trustee most unfortunately agreed to the withdrawal. The result was that the judge held that, as there was no proof by the moneylender on the file, the application under the above-mentioned subsection could not be sustained, and it was accordingly dismissed with costs. Through a technical mistake, Pockett is therefore allowed to retain—unless, indeed, the judge's decision is reversed on appeal—the plunder he secured from the bankrupt; but the fact of his legal victory does not in any way affect the value of the case as an example of his methods of extortion.

I am glad to see that the attention of the Attorney-General has been directed to the strong comments the Assistant Judge of the Lord Mayor's Court has frequently made on the scandal arising out of moneylending transactions with City clerks. In a question on the subject, Mr. H. C. Lea, M.P., asked whether there was any possibility of the Moneylenders Act being so amended that a Judge could re-open a transaction at any stage of the proceedings before him. But, as the Attorney-General's reply indicated, in this matter at least it is not the Act that is at fault. "The amendment required," said Sir John L. Walton, "appears to be in the direction of an alteration of County Court procedure, which will obviate the difficulty which has been experienced in the application of the Act," and he suggested that Mr. Lea should refer the subject to the consideration of the Lord Chancellor. I trust that the Lord Chancellor will have the necessary changes made in the County Court rules bearing on this Act. A most iniquitous system of usury, aggravated by methods of intimidation that are closely akin to blackmailing, is practised among City clerks and civil servants by such unprincipled rascals as the brothers Whiteman (alias "Cox and Co." and "Seymour and Whiteman"), and Wm. Henry Burgess (alias "Richards and Co."); and it is monstrous that Judges in the Lord Mayor's Court or elsewhere should be hampered in dealing with the evil by red-tape formalities of procedure.

Mr. R. Merry, the Chairman of the Holbeach Petty Sessions, has just repeated the ludicrous and unseemly performance on which I commented some months ago. He is a passive resister, and when the usual summonses by the overseers come on for hearing he retires from the Bench in order that his own case may be first dealt with. In the character of a defendant he addresses the customary protest to his fellow-magistrates against the exaction of any rate for denominational teaching, and his fellow-magistrates make the usual order for payment. Having thus won his own crown of cheap martyrdom—the balance of the education rate for which he was summoned on the present occasion was a trifle of 2s. 4d.—Mr. Merry resumes his seat as Chairman of the Bench, and in that capacity proceeds to make similar orders against the rest of the passive resisters. The passive resistance movement has always seemed to me to be rather absurd, but at Holbeach Mr. Merry makes it positively farcical.

There are certain offences which can only be properly dealt with by the infliction of a sharp term of imprisonment, but unfortunately there are many magistrates who can never be brought to see that cases of systematic ill-treatment of children are in this category. A glaring instance of this sort of misplaced leniency is supplied to my Legal Pillory by the case heard before the Bootle magistrates. It is absurd to contend that the man who tortures an orphan who is placed under his charge, and for whose maintenance he is adequately paid, can be properly punished for months of continuous brutality by the infliction of a fine of £10. A sharp term of imprisonment is the proper method of dealing with an offence such as this, and it is ridiculous to allow the ruffian guilty of it to escape the proper penalty by the payment of a fine:—

Bootle Police-court. Before the Mayor and Mr. F. Carruthers. Manasseh Berket, charged with cruelty to his nephew. The boy was an orphan of means, and the uncle received payment for his maintenance. He was frequently beaten during the past two years, and was made to do the housework. Medical evidence showed that he had been subjected to systematic ill-treatment. Fined £10 and costs.

Sheffield Police-court. Before Messrs. Grafton and Stephenson. George Taylor, charged with cruelty to a horse. For no reason he struck it twenty blows with the stock of a whip. Fined 10s.

Barnsley Police-court. John Hayes, charged with an aggravated assault on his wife. Because she went to nurse her mother, who was ill, he thrashed her severely. Fined 40s. and costs.

Grimsby Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. Osmund Falconer, charged with assaulting Mary Woolett. The woman left him to marry another man, so he broke into her house at night, attacked her, and threatened to kill her. Fined £1 1s. for the assault and 10s. for drunkenness.

Mansfield Police-court. T. W. Knott, charged with assaulting Priscilla Tudsbury. He attacked her as she was returning from church alone, but after a struggle she managed to escape. Fined a guinea.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Gray. Duncan McKenzie, charged with assaulting his wife. He kicked her several times and struck her with a pair of bellows. Fined 15s.

Doncaster Police-court. John Green, charged with cruelty to a horse. He beat it first with the lash and then with the whip stock. The horse broke away, and when it was pulled up he recommenced the thrashing. Fined £3 inclusive.

Heywood Petty Sessions. Benjamin France, charged with torturing a bullock. To make the exhausted animal get up he twisted its tail, put his finger in its eyes, probed the inside of the ear with a stick, and belaboured it unmercifully. Fined £2 and costs.

Worthing Police-court. Two boys, named David Scutt and Albert Hosier, charged with breaking open a slot gas meter and taking 2s. 1d. out of the money box. The meter was in the house of Scutt's aunt. Committed for trial at the Quarter Sessions.

East Harling Petty Sessions. William Smith and George West, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days' hard labour each.

Fareham Petty Sessions. Charles Baggs and J. Nash, charged with wilful damage. They were caught digging up primroses and fern roots. Baggs five weeks' hard labour; Nash four.

Eckington Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. H. Wells and J. J. Hounsfield. Thomas Grundy, a tramp, charged with sleeping out at Plumbley Colliery. Twenty-one days' hard labour.

Boston Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Thompson, W. Porter, and J. H. Simpson. Frederick Smith, aged 15, charged on remand with obstructing the footpath and using indecent language. Again remanded in custody for a week.

Ashford Police-court. Before Messrs. T. Nottige and J. Stirling. A girl, named Rose Searle, and a boy, named James Smith, charged with damaging a watercress bed. Each fined £1 11s. inclusive.

Perth Police-court. Before Bailie Young. Pietro Manatini, ice-cream dealer, charged with keeping his ice-cream shop open at 10.35 p.m., contrary to the bye-laws. Fined 30s.

Tonbridge Police-court. Edward Rogers, charged with stealing a shirt, value 2s. 6d. The shirt was taken from an outbuilding and sold by the prisoner for a shilling. Six week' hard labour.

Coventry County Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. H. Wheatley, T. R. Vickers, A. Ash, and T. Taylor. Henry William Simpson, charged with destroying his clothing at the Foleshill Workhouse. One month's hard labour.

Govan Police-court. Before Bailie Neilson. James Smith, charged with striking his wife on the head with a poker. An artery was severed. Fined three guineas. In two other cases of assault in which the same weapon was used the Bailie inflicted fines of £1 1s. and 30s. respectively.

Denbigh Police-court. F. Thomas Plant, charged with assaulting his wife. She had to leave him because of his treatment, and he broke into her parents' house, dragged her about by her hair, and punched her until she was nearly unconscious. Fined 50s. and costs.

Kirkham Police-court. Before Messrs. Nicholson and Benson. Thomas Brown, charged with absconding from the workhouse. He had been granted a day's leave on Saturday, but did not return until the Monday, and when the master spoke to him about it he left by climbing over the wall. Fourteen days' hard labour.

Bridgwater County Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Broadmead and other magistrates. John Parsons, charged with stealing oats and meal, value 12s., the property of his employer. A first offence, his employer saying he had been 20 years in his service. Two months' hard labour.

The power of committal for contempt of court is happily withheld from our magistrates, the theory of the law apparently being that any exhibition of contempt in a court of the Great Unpaid is a perfectly natural and excusable proceeding. Jersey is less fortunate in its law. That eccentric magistrate, Mr. John Vaudin, whose vagaries have often come under notice in Truth, can commit anybody for anything that he chooses to regard as contempt of his court, and he exercises his authority in this matter with the harshness and the tyranny that might be expected from the rest of his performances. The other day an aged gentleman who is always more or less incoherent in his speech was a witness in the court. Neither his words nor his demeanour were in the slightest degree offensive, but merely because in consequence of his infirmity he could not answer questions very clearly, Judge Vaudin peremptorily sentenced him to twenty-four hours' imprisonment.

This incident has excited a great deal of indignation in Jersey, but really it is but a mild specimen of the sentences that Mr. Vaudin has passed for contempt of court. On one occasion he gave a youth of eighteen a month's hard labour for the enormity of laughing at a witness who was giving evidence. In another case a witness—a small farmer and a churchwarden of his parish—was told by the magistrate, "Perhaps you were drunk." Obviously without any premeditated intention of being rude, he replied, "I was no more drunk than you are," whereupon he was committed for a week's hard labour. Apart from his record in matters of this description, Judge Vaudin's general incompetence as a magistrate has long been a public scandal in Jersey, and it is astonishing that his retention as a stipendiary—an office for which he was not qualified by any sort of legal training—is tolerated.

Apropos of my recent remarks on the tricks of the racing tipsters, a correspondent sends me a specimen copy of The Secret Special dated March 18. It contains what purport to be predictions giving the winners of the Lincolnshire Handicap, the Grand National, and other events, and if he had received the paper before the races were run my correspondent might have been sufficiently impressed by these successes to comply with the suggestion in the accompanying circular that he should remit a guinea for the next five issues of "the world's champion winner-finder." As, however, the specimen copy in question only reached him by post from Birmingham on March 23, he is inclined to suspect that it was really printed after the results of the races were known. I have no doubt that he is right. As a matter of fact, The Secret Special is one of the publications of the notorious Beston, who has been a constant practitioner of this essentially fraudulent method of gulling simple-minded backers.

The following letter adds a little interesting information to what has already appeared respecting the traffic in secretaryships of the Betterment of London Association. It apparently arises out of one of the advertisements for a secretary referred to in my article of March 20. On receipt of the letter the gentleman to whom it was written recognised Mr. Bowden Green as the occupant of a niche in the Truth Cautionary List, and consequently went no further with the negotiations:—

STREET NOISES ABATEMENT COMMITTEE.
2, Harrington-gardens, South Kensington, W.
February 17, 1907.

Dear Sir,—Your letter replying to our advertisement in yesterday's papers is to hand, and I herewith enclose some particulars of the movement for which a West-End secretary is desired.

It is essential that the gentleman undertaking the post should be in thorough accord with the work of the Association, or he would not be successful at it.

With regard to the investment, I can give you the minimum and the maximum amounts—namely, £250—£500, but the exact sum is a matter for arrangement at interview, as also is the matter of remuneration. Office hours 10 to 5, usually speaking, but no hard-and-fast lines drawn. Should you desire to discuss the appointment, please send word what day next week you would be in London. This office is close to Gloucester-road Station and a few minutes' walk from South Kensington Station.
—Yours faithfully, Thomas Bowden Green.

It looks a nice easy job—"no hard and fast lines drawn" in regard to attendance at the office, and probably not much to do beyond writing letters and making calls in the hope of obtaining the subscriptions, which are to yield the remuneration. It is not surprising that Bowden Green has been able to get a good many hundred pounds out of gentlemen on these terms—as little surprising as that, when they have obtained a closer acquaintance with the business, their chief anxiety is to get their money back and escape as quickly as possible.

People in the provinces should beware of advertisements like the following, which appears in a Shropshire paper, and is no doubt to be found all over the country:—

Pianoforte.—Marvellous Offer. Magnificent 56-Guinea Upright Iron Grand, slightly used, to be sacrificed for £15 15s., cash payable in one, two, or three years. . . Seven days' trial, free carriage paid anywhere.—Goudge, 231, Burdett-road, Bow, London, E.

As already mentioned in Truth more than once, Goudge is a manufacturer of shoddy pianos, which are disposed of by advertisements like this, conveying that they are second-hand bargains. The only novelty in the above announcement is that Goudge's general practice has been to offer his instruments from a bogus address, in the character of a doctor, or officer, or other party "about to leave England." That he now discloses his true name and address is probably attributable to the fact that he has lately offered his advertisements directly to the newspapers, instead of placing them through an agent, in order to secure the agent's commission for himself; and apparently he finds some newspapers shy of publishing the old form of advertisement when it is actually offered by the piano-maker himself. The real value of an instrument which can be sold new at fifteen guineas, with three years' credit, and "carriage paid anywhere," should be sufficiently obvious.

In the last issue of the Truth Cautionary List reference was made to the business of the Iron-Ox Remedy Company, the ground on which it was placed in the list being that bogus testimonials had been used for advertising purposes. The facts in regard to these testimonials have been stated on earlier occasions in Truth. I have now been in communication on this subject with Messrs. McKenna and Co., of Basinghall-street, solicitors to the company, with the result that I think that the unfavourable reflection above mentioned is not justified by the facts at the present date. The explanation given is that in obtaining and using such testimonials as were referred to in Truth, the manager of the English branch of the business acted not only indiscreetly, but in opposition to express orders from headquarters; and I am assured that since attention was called to the matter in Truth none but perfectly genuine testimonials have been used. I am glad to hear it, and to give publicity to the fact.

In this connection I have made an interesting discovery. It appears that the Iron-Ox Company, since their remedy first began to be advertised, have been inundated with offers from unscrupulous persons to provide them on moderate terms with the usual testimonial accompanied by a photograph. Presumably their experience in this respect is not singular. When bogus testimonials can be obtained so easily by any large advertiser, the temptation to take them and use them, without going to the trouble of worrying genuine customers for them, must be considerable. We certainly live in a very wicked world.

With reference to a recent paragraph in Truth on the modus operandi of the Institute Schimmelpfeng, I have received a letter from the general manager for Great Britain and Ireland, giving me particulars of the history of the business from the time when the first Herr Schimmelpfeng started it in Berlin, as well as particulars of the expenditure upon the business, the number of the offices and staff in various countries, and so on. I take this to be a response to my suggestion that the Institute should furnish me with the same kind of information which it invites business men indiscriminately to supply to itself. I am bound to say that I did not make the suggestion quite seriously, and still less expected it to be taken seriously. I do not question that the Institute is doing a large business, and that its success justifies its existence. But its managers really cannot be surprised if some of the people who receive their requests for information regard the application as somewhat impertinent.

THE CABINET OF THE FUTURE.

I dreamt the Suffragettes had gained
The aim on which they're set,
And high positions had obtained
Within the Cabinet.

And as around the board they sat
To settle grave affairs,
The Première looked her colleagues at
And thus the case declares.

"We've met to talk, my dears, to-day
Of Egypt's troubled state.
It seems—Oh, Minnie, love, do say
Have I my hat on straight?—

What's to be done to make it clear
To those vile Fellaheen—
I think I'll trim the bodice, dear,
With frills of crêpe de chine—

And Ireland, things are awful there;
That Redmond gives no peace—
If I were you, I'd do my hair
Up à l'impératrice—

I fear we'll have Home Rule to try;
Naught less the brutes will stop—
Oh, are you going, by the by,
To Lady Smithson's hop?

The Estimates—well, I declare,
'Tis after half-past two!—
My Fido waits to take the air
(Sweet pet), so, dears, adieu."

I sympathise with President Roosevelt in his desire to put an end to a state of things which prevents most Europeans from investing their money in American railways, and makes all shareholders in these undertakings mere pawns in the game of great railway magnates. American railway presidents have far too much power over the finances and the financial policy of these companies to render their shares safe. They are always plotting and scheming with confederates to fill their own pockets, and usually they manage to effect their purpose at the cost of their shareholders and of the public. In their defence they urge that, thanks to them, new railways are built. This may be true to a certain extent. But they are like those charity-mongers among us, who may be able to show that they really spend on charity a little of the money that they collect, but whose charity begins at home.

When I hear the vast fortune of a Railway King spoken of, I ask myself, From whom comes his plunder? Sometimes they fight, but who pays for their battles? They are even more dangerous as friends than as enemies, for the friends join in some nefarious campaign against everybody else. When railway shares are high they scheme to produce a fall; when they are low, they starve their lines in order to pay high dividends, and thus produce a rise. What surprises me is that they do not become even more rich than they are. Of course, there are honest men amongst them. But they are the minority. The majority of them, judging by the revelations of the recent official investigation of their doings, are entirely lost to shame. Their ethics are those which, if practised by poor men, would land them in a prison in any self-respecting country. Americans would do well to go to the root of the evil and end it. Most of them in their private relations are honest. All of them have at heart the good name of their country. But, even on the lower plane of self-interest, they will be wise if they support their President, and not only cease to regard a man who is a great millionaire as a licensed thief, but take good care that he be sent to prison as a deterrent to others who might be disposed to follow his example.

I see it stated that general legislation is difficult because it conflicts with State rights. If this be so, the Constitution provides means to meet this difficulty. What is needed is legislation to protect shareholders against the nefarious schemes of those who get large salaries to look after their interests. But laws alone are not enough. As long as rings can be formed to get the voting power by the purchase of shares, there will always be bogus amalgamations, bogus leases, and such like devices, for the benefit of those who can pull the wires and are "in the know." What should be done is not merely to strengthen the law in the interest of the shareholder, but to establish an official Railway Board, consisting of men of high repute, holding their positions permanently like the judges of the Supreme Court, in whom would be vested full powers to interfere when they think things are going wrong, and whose assent would be needed for all amalgamations, leases, issues of capital, etc. There ought also to be an official audit of accounts each year. This would inspire confidence, and—after some half-dozen magnates had been sent to prison for violating the law—an American railway share would be deemed a sound investment, when bought at a price bearing some sort of relation to its intrinsic value.

As it is, Europeans who are neither fools nor gamblers keep aloof from them; indeed, most of the gambling class already do so, for they are not so silly as to play against persons who meet them with cogged dice. Probably the wary in America assume the same attitude toward railway shares as Europeans. I do not know what amount of money represents the intrinsic value of American railways. But surely it is great enough for the community to see that it is honestly administered, and for the benefit of those who have provided it. Moreover, it is understood that large railway extensions are needed. Who is likely to provide the capital, unless the whole system in its financial aspect is reformed, except on terms that necessitate the most excessive charges on freight and passengers in order to pay interest?

THE RETIRING BULLFINCH.

Once of a Bullfinch Hen I heard—
By no means an attractive Bird—
Who might have been (so you'd surmise)
Glad of a Mate at any Price.
Yet 'twas not so, for, though was she
As plain and homely as could be,
Far from accepting first Advances
From any Male on whom she chances,
Or taking smallest Pains or Thought
To throw herself his Path athwart,
She rather made a Point (they say)
Of keeping out of Cock-birds' Way—
Nay, mostly, when they came in Sight,
She'd to a Distance wing her Flight.
Now when they marked her thus avoid
Their Presence, they 're at first annoyed;
But soon their challenged Pride was stirred
To woo and win this scornful Bird,

And Each with Other eager vies
To make her his especial Prize.
The other Hens, with puzzled Mien,
And jealous, too, surveyed the Scene.
'Twas vain their pretty Selves they cast
In every Cock-bird's Way who passed;
'Twas vain they spread their Charms to view,
And twittered, "Come and bill me, do";
Those Males, with an indifferent Stare,
Passed them all by, though ne'er so fair,
And bent their Efforts to pursuing
The one who would avoid their Wooing.
So when next Time her Sisters met
This Hen, they her forthwith beset,
And said: "Than you we're lovelier far,
'Tis incontestable we are;
Eke we behave most nice and sweet
To all the handsome Cocks we meet,
Encouraging each likely Beau
By all th' alluring Arts we know;
Yet though almost, nay even quite,
Their fond Attentions we invite,
They scarcely deign, by some strange Chance,
To throw us e'en a single Glance;
While, after you, you homely Creature,
Who haven't one attractive Feature,
And who have always, too, displayed
A wish their Presence to evade—
Yes, after you they run—'tis funny—
Like Armadilloes after Honey.
Why is't with you they 're wild to match,
Who are both plain and hard to catch,
While us they keep contemptuous slighting,
Who are both pretty and inviting?"
To whom the Other made Reply:
"I'll tell you, Dears, the Reason why.
What they can for the Asking win,
The Cock-birds that see Nothing in,
But Store alone by that will set
Which is remote and hard to get.
That's why they 're wild with me to match—
Just 'cos I'm difficult to catch!"

SCRUTATOR.

THE TERRITORIAL CADET.

MR. HALDANE presented prizes last week to a cadet battalion, and he took the opportunity of calling attention to the importance of the cadet in relation to the Territorial Army scheme. This is a point which may easily be overlooked, and Mr. Haldane is quite right to lay stress upon it. The place of the cadet in relation to the general scheme is provided for by Sections 2 and 3 of the Government Bill. The powers and duties of county associations, as defined by Sect. 2 are to include (sub-section f) "establishing and maintaining, or fostering and encouraging cadet battalions and corps and rifle clubs;" and by Sect. 4 the Army Council is empowered to make regulations affiliating all these bodies to the Territorial Force, or any part thereof. It will therefore become the statutory business of every county association to start and keep up cadet battalions, and the cadets will have a definite relation to the Territorial battalions, which the Army Council may make as close and strict as it pleases.

In my humble judgment it is impossible to insist too strongly upon the proper discharge of this particular business, and the Army Council will have to see that it is not neglected. There are a great many people preaching at present the military and social advantages of giving all young men and boys military training. Like all propagandists they over-state their case, and in more ways than one; but while dissenting from their conclusions, it is possible to admit that there is an element of truth in what they say, both on the military and on the social aspect of the question. To take the military side first: the most important point seems to be that if you give the requisite number of boys two or three years' preliminary training in a properly conducted cadet corps, you greatly simplify the problem of training your Territorial Army. A boy who joins a cadet corps at fifteen, or thereabouts, ought to know his drill thoroughly, and to have made good progress with his shooting, by the time he is eighteen and ready to join an adult battalion. There is no reason why he should not join his battalion quite as well drilled and trained as any recruit who joins a regular battalion from a depot; in point of fact, I should think he will generallly be a more valuable solidier than the average infantry depot at present turns out, for he will have had the advantage of being caught young, and being thoroughly imbued with habits of discipline and soldierly instincts before he has had time to acquire any of a contrary tendency. We have heard a great deal during the last two or three years about the necessity for a period of several months' continuous training for Militia recruits, and something of the same kind is apparently contemplated by way of preliminary training on enlistment for "every man in the Territorial Force." But if that force obtains, as it should, a considerable proportion of its recruits from efficient cadet corps, the necessity for anything further in the shape of preliminary training may be more or less obviated, and the difficulty of adequately training the Territorial Force is reduced to that extent. This is the first advantage of the cadet corps from the military point of view. Further, it is almost certain to be found that the multiplication and enlargement of cadet battalions in all parts of the country will greatly stimulate recruiting for the Territorial Force. Boys who have been serving in such battalions for two or three years will not have done so unless they like the work and feel keen about it, and it may be pretty safely assumed that the majority of them will desire to pass into the battalions to which they have been affiliated as soon as they reach the requisite age. Hitherto cadet corps have always been conducted under more or less serious financial difficulties, and their attractiveness to boys has been limited in consequence. The more money you can spend on them, the more attractive you will make them, which is the same thing as saying that it will rest with the county associations to make them as attractive as they please.

I hardly think that anyone will dispute the value of cadet corps training to the boy himself and his neighbours. There is a prejudice among many people against fostering the spirit of "militarism" in boys. It is reasonable up to a point, and I sympathise with it. But the value of lessons in discipline, self-control, and mutual co-operation cannot be disputed; and boys who leave school at fourteen years of age—that is to say, all boys of the working class—are apt to suffer from lack of such educational influences at the most critical period of their lives. Everybody who has had anything to do with boys' clubs and similar institutions knows the great moral good that is done by bringing working boys under the influence of some organisation which provides them with occupation, stimulates self-respect, and creates esprit de corps and respect for law and order. This sort of influence is necessarily exercised by the cadet corps. I put the moral aspect of the question first, because these considerations have to be weighed against the moral objections to military training. But the physical benefits have also to be taken into account. Cadet service means regular exercise and physical drill, occasional marches into the country, and an annual holiday in a country or seaside camp under discipline—all of them invaluable for the development of physique in a growing boy.

For these reasons the cadet battalion has a very real social value, apart from the assistance which it may yield to military organisation; and all money spent upon it is a good investment, yielding profitable national assets. The only danger to be guarded against is that of overdoing the training and working boys too hard. It is very easy to disgust them in this way, and cause them to give up at the earliest opportunity. It may be worth while considering whether this is not done already at some of the Public Schools. I heard it said a few months ago, on the authority of an officer of a University Volunteer corps, that the Public School cadet is apt to prove shy of volunteering when he comes up to the 'Varsity, the reason being that he has had a "sickener" of it at school. It must be remembered that a large proportion of the members of a school cadet corps are volunteers only in name. A great many boys join under compulsion from parents or pressure from masters. It may be desirable to apply a little compulsion in this way, and considering that it is applied at the Public Schools to cricket, football, and other games, there is no reason why it should not be applied to soldiering. But if your boy "Volunteer" is in fact a conscript, you must handle him a little tenderly, and endeavour to encourage in him that love of the business which has not come to him by nature. Outside the Public School corps cadets will be Volunteers pure and simple, but even here they may need, in many cases, a good deal of coaxing and indulgence during their first year or so. I have a friend, an old Public School and University man, who has spent all the best years of his life in working as a boys' club manager in London. I do not think any man living knows the London working boy better. He told me once that very few boys under fifteen or sixteen years of age will show any keenness for volunteering. For a few weeks, he said, they may be taken with the idea of wearing a uniform and playing at soldiers, but when the novelty wears off the boy of that age soon finds the routine of drills and marches irksome. The martial spirit which causes a lad to derive a real pleasure from shouldering arms and marching out with the band, longing for the chance of putting a bullet into an enemy of his country, does not come as a rule until the threshold of manhood is reached. From my own experience of the human animal in the earlier stages of his development, I should judge that there is a good deal of truth in this, and that if cadets, especially of the working class, are enlisted very young, it would be wise to make their soldiering as much like play as possible for the first year of their service. These, however, are details which do not call for consideration at present.

CATHOLICISM AND MAMMON.

In connection with the discussion on the administration of Roman Catholic trusts, my attention has been called to the history of certain troubles which arose ten years ago in connection with the Secular Clergy Common Fund of the dioceses of Westminster and Southwark—the latter then including the diocese of Portsmouth. The story is interesting owing to the close resemblance between the facts and those which have come to light in connection with the Dawes bequest. The administrator of the fund seems to have been bitten with the mania for speculation which has so long been the curse of the Roman Catholic Church in England. Like others, he was actuated by wholly disinterested motives, fancying that he had sufficient knowledge of the Stock Exchange to increase the resources of the fund by judicious "bulling" and "bearing." Like others, however, who have used ecclesiastical trust funds as a "financial basis" for operations of this kind, he failed dismally, and lost no less than £3,782 of the capital of the fund. When the losses got wind, the clergy of the two dioceses appointed a committee of investigation, which went thoroughly into the matter. It eventually reported that arrangements had been made with the defaulting administrator, by which he was to make over to the fund three life policies of £1,000 each, and to give a lien upon certain freehold property to cover the balance of the losses and the premiums on the life policies, as well as interest until the debt was discharged. The fund was not wholly indemnified, but the actual capital lost was repaid, and I understand that the reverend gentleman who brought the trouble about had the satisfaction of seeing it all repaid before he died.

It will be seen that this case affords an exact parallel, in all but the last stage, to that of the Dawes trustees and the losses in the Bishop bankruptcy. There is absolutely no legal reason why all concerned in these losses should not have been compelled to make restitution as was the erring priest who played the same trick with the securities of the Secular Clergy Fund, unless there is to be one law and one measure of justice for priests and another for higher dignitaries, including bishops and archbishops. One difference, of course, there is between the two cases. In that of the Secular Clergy Fund there were plenty of interested parties to take the matter up and call the defaulting administrator to book. In that of the Dawes Trust, and in other similar cases, it is nobody's business to take action. But this only makes it the more astonishing that the authorities at Rome should have allowed these incidents to pass unnoticed, and should have acquiesced in the loss of enormous funds of which restitution might justly have been demanded. It is not surprising that English Catholics should feel that they have been sadly deserted by their Holy Father in this matter.

The following letter, though it only recapitulates facts which have already been stated, is of interest as an expression of the feelings now widely current among educated and reflective Catholics, lay and clerical:—

If any proof were needed of the good which has been done by your allowing the Catholic Trusts question to be ventilated in your pages, it is surely to be found in the very lively and eager interest which has been taken in the matter by so large a section of the public. May I suggest that now a point has been reached when it is useful to recall distinctly and definitely a few of the facts which have, no doubt, contributed to the feelings of unrest and distrust which exist in the minds of many English Catholics?

In the first place, it is known that when the late Mr. Willock Dawes left a very large sum of money to the Southwark Diocese, a great part of which afterwards disappeared in the now celebrated "Bishop" failure, there were certain Trustees in whose names these and other diocesan funds were vested. Whether Dr. Bourne was himself technically a Trustee or not seems rather immaterial, considering that in an English Roman Catholic Diocese the Bishop is practically ex officio the virtual Trustee of all Diocesan funds, and if there are other legal and technical Trustees he appoints them. Now, leaving aside altogether the reasonableness of entrusting trust funds to a stockbroker, is there any record during the years in which Mr. Bishop's firm managed the moneys left by Mr. Dawes, that Dr. Bourne or the Trustees exercised from time to time the most ordinary measures of prudence and precaution by checking the amounts invested in different securities, and especially by themselves retaining possession of these, their own securities? Catholics mostly think, rightly or wrongly, that Bishop Bourne and the Trustees were content to leave everything in the most confiding manner in the hands of the stockbroker, and were quite satisfied to get their dividends. Were the investments rotten, such as caused disaster in the Portsmouth Diocese, or had the Trustees no securities for any investments in their own hands?

Secondly: Mr. Willock Dawes, in the knowledge of everybody, built the church and presbytery at Petworth, and liberally endowed the same, so that Canon Lalor (Mr. Dawes' most intimate friend) and his successors in this small country mission might be amply provided for at the founder's expense. No sooner are Mr. Dawes and Canon Lalor in their coffins than it is reported among Catholics that half or a considerable portion of the Petworth endowment has been diverted by Bishop Bourne, and that a clergyman has been placed there who has been a consenting party to this alienation, having some means of his own. Now, if there be any clause in the Dawes will leaving such discretion to the Bishop as would justify this alienation of a portion of the endowment, ought not this clause to have been made public at once, so that no suspicion of illegal or interested action could attach to the Bishop?

Thirdly: Can it excite wonder, Sir, that Catholics are beginning to feel every day more and more suspicious of episcopal finance when a Bishop, who is himself known to be on the most intimate terms with the present Metropolitan, boasts of his very questionable financial speculations, and relates how Providence blessed his gambling in the good cause, gambling, too, with moneys which were certainly not his private property, and which were eventually utterly dissipated? Can financial infatuation further go?

Now you yourself, Sir, during the course of this open discussion have remarked more than once upon the personal feeling, or even animus, which has been but thinly veiled in the case of some of your correspondents. This has apparently struck you as puzzling to account for, and no doubt it may have puzzled some of your readers. The truth is that there is something more at the root of all this trouble than meets the eye of the mere outsider, who may think that it is all a matter of £ s. d. More than one of the writers in Truth have hinted, not obscurely, at other difficulties; arbitrary episcopal action with regard to men as well as money; titular appointments cum jure secured, and others to actual sees in this country obtained, quite regardless of capitular voting or clerical desire; ways and devices many, tortuous and winding, wherein serpentine cunning has been more in evidence than dove-like simplicity. Now, there are no people, laity or clergy, who have such an exalted idea of the episcopal office as Catholics. But the very greatness and spiritual glory of the office require in their eyes a corresponding freedom from vulgar ambition, from the taint, or even the suspicion, of selfish scheming and intrigue, whereby men, possibly without censure, may climb to places of political power and mere worldly eminence. When Catholics recognise that it is the digitus Dei which has given them their Bishop, they naturally feel very differently in his regard than they do or can when it is thought or feared that influences the reverse of spiritual have been hard at work. The logical foundation for such feelings or fears is of its own nature hardly susceptible of mathematical proof, but public opinion does not often commit a grave injustice, especially when the firm bias of loyalty and respect is altogether on the other side. The whole world recognised that Pius X. was placed in the Pontifical chair against all his wishes, ambitions, and expectations, and it was precisely this humility which made all see the finger of God in his election. The man who is the most desirous of spiritual rule may, according to the ascetics, be put down as the most unfitted for the burden. Common sense endorses this view.

A gentleman, of whose religious persuasion I know nothing, writes to tell me that he has once or twice doubted the genuineness of letters from Roman Catholics that have appeared in Truth because they are not signed. He is now confirmed in his opinion by a passage in one of the letters published last week, in which diversion of certain endowments are said to be "against the Church's interpretation of the eighth commandment." He goes on to point out that "in the Catholic Church the eighth commandment refers to bearing false witness against a neighbour," whereas in the Protestant Church it is "Thou shalt not steal." My correspondent has not allowed for the facts (1) that MS. does not always get into print precisely as it is written, and (2) that in this case the MS. had to run the gauntlet of non-Catholic printers, readers, and editors. The author of the letter published last week wrote "seventh commandment" plainly enough; manet scripta litera. But Protestant or other heretical revisers, who attach a very different meaning to the seventh commandment, thought in their ignorance that he must have meant the eighth, and altered the word for him accordingly. I have to apologise to him.

The other point, about letters not being signed, is scarcely worth arguing about. I said all that was worth saying about it long ago in answer to a newspaper critic. To suppose that a number of people who are not Roman Catholics would take the trouble to join in a controversy of this kind is childish. The only imputation that a writer who withholds his name lays himself open to is a lack of courage or personal animus. For lack of courage no one but his ecclesiastical superiors will blame him; and the charge of personal animus is irrelevant so long as his facts and arguments cannot be answered. Of course, a great many people have written to me on this question of whom I know nothing beyond their names and addresses; but those whose letters have made most mark are priests and laymen for whose trustworthiness as witnesses of fact and loyalty to their Church I can personally vouch. The last remark applies to the letter given above, and to all those published last week. Even the unfortunate correspondent who has incurred suspicion of not knowing how the Commandments are numbered by his Church, happens to be a priest against whom I think no man living can say a word. The criticism above mentioned is therefore very wide of the mark, though I am glad that it has given me the opportunity of making these remarks.

THE COMPLETE CATECHIST.

The J.P.'s Catechism.

(For the use of Amateur Magistrates.)

Question: Who are you?

Answer: A Justice of the Peace.

Q.: What is a Justice of the Peace?

A.: A judicial Functionary appointed to repress crime among the rural population.

Q.: Who made you a Justice of the Peace?

A.: The Lord Chancellor, on the recommendation of the Lord-Lieutenant.

Q.: What qualifications have you for the office?

A.: My wife is niece to the Lord Lieutenant.

Q.: What is crime?

A.: Crime is of three sorts; the infamous, the ordinary, and the venial.

Q. Quote me examples of infamous crime.

A.: Poaching, Motoring, and Murder.

Q.: And of ordinary crime.

A.: Arson, Larceny, and Sleeping Out.

Q.: And of venial crime.

A.: Wife-beating.

Q.: What do you mean by the crime of "Sleeping Out?"

A.: I mean the crime of having no money to pay for a lodging, and so being compelled to pass the night in the open air.

Q.: How do you punish this crime?

A.: With three weeks' hard labour.

Q.: What do you mean by "Wife-beating?"

A.: I mean the playful ebullition of high spirits, which prompts an intoxicated navvy to knock his wife down with the poker, and to kick her, when she is down, with his hob-nailed boots.

Q.: How do you punish this playful ebullition of high spirits?

A.: If his wife is not in a delicate state of health at the time, I fine him ten shillings.

Q.: But if his wife is in a delicate state of health at the time?

A.: Then I fine him two-and-sixpence.

Q.: What is a Chauffeur?

A.: A perjured miscreant, who is constitutionally incapable of speaking the truth.

Q.: What is a Constable?

A.: A man of unimpeachable veracity.

Q.: Does the Constable stand alone in this honourable quality?

A.; No; he has one equal.

Q.: Who is that?

A.: The Game-Keeper.

Q.: What is an Exemption Certificate?

A.: A Certificate of Exemption from Vaccination, which conscientious objectors are empowered, by Law, to claim from me.

Q.: Do they often claim it?

A.: Very often.

Q.: Do they often obtain it?

A.: Never.

Q.: Why do they never obtain it?

A.: Because such vulgar wretches have no consciences and, therefore, cannot entertain conscientious objections.

Q.: What is Law?

A.: The mighty and salutary Social Engine which protects the property of the rich and keeps the poor in their places.

Q.: What are the places of the poor?

A.: The Workhouse, the Reformatory, and the Prison.

Q.: What is Education?

A.: The Curse of the Country.

Q.: Who is the Home Secretary?

A.: The Jack-in-Office who revises my decisions.

Q.: Does he often revise them?

A.: As often as his attention is called to them.

Q.: Who calls his attention to them?

A.: Usually, Radicals.

Q.: What are Radicals?

A.: Radicals are the enemies of Law and Order, and consequently of the Magistracy. They are the class whom it is the duty of a Magistrate to Put Down.

THE THEATRES.

The Stage Society at the Imperial.

The Stage Society produced last week, in English save for the title, a play by M. Brieux, which might not improperly be called "The Cockchafers." Here M. Brieux shows himself much less of the stern moralist than in most of his other work. He is content to observe life, and half ironically to note its absurdities and the fatal consequences which ensue from loving not wisely enough to wed. Mr. France made of the middle-aged hero a very living person. He took the part quietly, and impressed quite as much by reason of what he did not say as by the remarks that fell from his lips. This French lover has a mistress, selected entirely for her beauty from the ranks of the shopgirls, and they have long been living together when the play opens. It is not very dramatic, this constant bickering of the pair, but although nothing very dramatic happens until quite the end of the play, when the young woman, after a quarrel, attempts and fails to commit suicide; yet all the time one is amused and interested. This is because the play is based upon real observation of an incident that actually did occur in Paris, and the art of Mr. France and, to a less degree, that of Miss Mabel Hackney, who made a clever yet not quite convincing mistress, help the dramatist to give us a slice of reality. There are humorous touches, too, as when the young woman throws the key of their flat out of window and hits a neighbour, who comes up to protest. In the French version this is very amusing, and although the play was not a great success in the original, yet in the hands of a Guitry and of a Polaire it enjoyed more than a succès d'estime. It is some time since I have spent so pleasant an afternoon at a Stage Society's performance.

* * * * *

At the Palace Theatre there are several novelties this week. Among them I note the appearance of Miss Josephine Cohan in a new sketch entitled "A Friend of the Family," and the Bioscope pictures of the Grand National Steeplechase.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

VACCINATION FIVE O'CLOCKS.

I RECEIVED a short time ago a circular marked "private," telling me where and on what terms I could have myself insured against smallpox. It has since occurred to me that possibly touts employed by the insurance company created business for it by spreading the scare, for which the Morocco excitement may prove a cure. The French insurance tout does not generally get any commission, but he knows he will be paid so much on every policy-holder he brings in. I remember some years ago a trial of a tout who was charged with setting fire to an isolated shed where shavings were heaped up, for the purpose of creating an opportunity to go round proposing policies of insurance against fire. He had Charing Cross Hospital, W.C., Convalescent Home. Limpsfield, dependent on £15,000 a year from voluntary sources. Contributions urgently solicited.
